

KOONTZ STONE HOUSE

AL-VI-B-035
Old Legislative Road, Midland
1826

The Koontz Stone House was completed by Henry Koontz in October of 1826. Koontz was one of the early settlers to the George's Creek area and during this time period the area now called Midland was known as "Koontz." The house itself is constructed of local sandstone and required over seven years to complete. The house consists of a two and a half story, three bay wide, rectangular shaped block with walls over two feet thick. The house retains much of its original appearance and remains one of the county's most outstanding stone structures.

Prepare both a summary paragraph and a general description of the resource and its various elements as it exists today.

The Koontz Stone House and associated outbuildings are located along the Old Legislative Road (formerly the Old Coney Road) approximately .6 miles west of Midland, Maryland.

Structurally, the house consists of a two-and-a-half story rectangular stone dwelling abutted on the southwest side by another one-and-a-half story stone section which was constructed first to house the builders. A high stone foundation underlies the structure, which is built on a small grade that slopes from northwest to southeast. The stone walls themselves are 25 inches thick and are laid in a coursed rubble pattern, and exhibit plain features and no water table. Windows along the first floor of the main block consist of double-hung wooden sash frames with nine-over-six lights. All other double-hung sashes have six-over-six lights. A total of four entrance-ways are found leading into the house; each block has both a front and rear entrance. A gabled roof covered with tin serves both blocks, and there is a soffit under the eaves of the front and rear of the house. Vertically placed stones form jackarches over the windows on the front and rear of the main block. A three bay front end shed-roofed porch shields the two front entrances. Each of the two rear entrances has its own two bay shed-roofed porch. An original corbeled stone chimney is located on the flush end of both the northeast and southwest sides.

Approximately 17 outbuildings are located around the Koontz Stone House. They include a granary, a blacksmith shop, car garage, chicken houses, tractor house, pig pen, store shed for a hay baler, coal bin, springhouse, out house, barn shed and other various machine houses. The barn is a large, rectangular, one-and-a-half story frame structure sheathed by vertical boards and protected by a tin-covered gable roof. It rests on a high stone foundation and has single sash windows with stone jackarches.

The springhouse, which is located between the barn and the main house, is a one story stone structure also built with a coursed rubble pattern. Like the house, it has a tin covered gabled roof. Other outbuildings are predominantly of vertical board construction.

The Koontz Stone House still retains its original fabric and appearance, is structurally sound and stands in fair condition. The springhouse is in poor condition while the barn is classified as deteriorated.

Prepare both a summary paragraph of significance and a general statement of history and support.

The Koontz Stone House was completed in October of 1826 by Henry Koontz, an early settler to the George's Creek area. The house is a simple rectangular stone block with remnants of the Federal style in a rural setting. The entire area including the town of Midland, was known as Koontz during this early settlement period. It was not until the mining era in the mid 19th century that towns began to appear near the Koontz estate. The Koontz property was comprised of military lots and the house stands on part of "Commonwealth", a property granted to John Moyer in 1801.¹

The Koontz Stone House is the largest and most finely finished early 19th century stone dwelling in the George's Creek Valley. The house required seven years to complete and is constructed of local sandstone. This is the only early side stair passage double parlor dwelling in the valley, and is particularly noteworthy due to the elaborate mantel and woodwork.

The house is currently occupied by the Winters family, who have lived there for the past fifty years. Elijah Winters was the first Winter to own the property and he operated his own blacksmith shop making wagons and wheels and also furniture and violins. However, the house is now endangered by strip mining operations and the property is indeed owned by a coal company with the Winter's family option of living there until their death.

In addition to the fine dwelling, the farm includes a barn, a stone outbuilding, and several frame outbuildings.

Addenda: Architectural Description by Merry Stinson, Fall, 1982

The Koontz Stone House is located on the east side of the Old Legislative Road west of Midland. The two-story stone structure stands on the eastern slope of Big Savage Mountain, overlooking the George's Creek Valley to the east.

The three-bay by two-bay structure is joined by a two-bay, one story kitchen to the south. Either section is covered by a north-south gable roof. As the land slopes to the east, the cellars of both sections are exposed on the side.

The principal facade faces west. Interior stone chimneys heat either extreme end of the house. Porches cover both sides of the kitchen, the southern entrance of the principal facade, and the two southern bays of the rear facade.

Entrances appear in the southernmost bay on either side of the main section, and in the northern bay of the facade of the kitchen. The kitchen cellar is entered in the northern bay, and the main cellar has a central entrance.

Double-hung 9/6 sash windows light the first floor of the main section and 1/1 sash windows light the second floor on the rear of the house; 6/6 sash windows occupy the other openings. Two six-pane casement windows appear in the north end of the main attic while one such window appears in the south end. The kitchen attic includes two single-pane windows in the south gable end. Plain boards form all architraves.

The roughly coursed sandstone masonry of the building features jack-arched window openings, well-laid quoins and a drip course on either chimney cap. The stonework is white-washed on the exterior the full height of the cellar level, as well as under the porch areas. Both roofs are covered with corrugated metal punctuated by three rows of iron "snowbirds".

Interior access to the main floor of the building was not available. The present owner of the Koontz Stone House reports, however, that the kitchen consists of one large room with a fireplace. The main section features a side stair hall along the south gable end, with two adjoining parlors to the north. It is believed that either parlor was heated by a fireplace, as was at least one of the bed chambers above. The owner describes the stair as including a plain, round-topped newel post, square balusters, broad steps, and undecorated step ends.

The main cellar, which was examined, is divided into two rooms. A stair leading to the main floor is located in the southwest corner. A fireplace occupies the north end.

A mantel from one of the first-floor parlors is stored in the cellar. The exquisitely carved piece features reeded pilasters, a central gougework panel, cavetto/astragal moldings, twisted-rope trim, and an elaborately molded shelf.

Numerous frame outbuildings surround the house and line both sides of the Old Legislative Road. A small, gabled stone outbuilding appears south of the house. Further to the south a frame bank barn stands on a stone foundation.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Koontz Stone House was completed in October of 1826 by Henry Koontz, an early settler to the George's Creek area. The house is a simple rectangular stone block with remenance of the federal style in a rural setting. The entire area including the town of Midland, was known as Koontz during this early settlement period. The Koontz property was comprised of military lots and the house stands on part of "Commonwealth", a property granted to John Guyer in 1801.¹

The Koontz House itself is one of the most structurally sound and one of the finest examples of stone construction in Allegany County. The residence required seven years to complete and is constructed of local sandstone. The walls of the structure are twenty five inches thick and beams supporting the first and second stories reach upwards of four feet in diameter.

The house is currently occupied by the Winters family, who have lived there for the past fifty years. Elijah Winters was the first Winter to own the property and he operated his own blacksmith shop making wagons and wheels and also furniture and violins. However, the house is now endangered by strip mining operations and the property is indeed owned by a coal company with the Winter's family option of living there until their death. With the house being in fair condition, it remains a cultural and architectural reminder of a way of life once found in Allegany County and recommendations for this structure to be on the National Register are certainly in order.
