Annapolis

1857

Anchoring the south end of the City Hotel Annex, the wedge-shaped brick dwelling located at 150 Conduit Street is part of six-unit rowhouse block that was erected around 1857 as a sizable addition to the long-time Annapolis hostelry. For the past several decades the rowhouse block has been known as “Rainbow Row,” inspired by the range of pastel colors that distinguish the individual units. The one-bay wide dwelling identified as 150 Conduit Street has survived with a high level of architectural integrity with relatively few exterior changes. Like the other units in the block the common bond walls rise to corbelled brick cornices. The appearance of the end dwelling differs from the adjacent sections with its parapet gable end wall and interior end brick chimney. Built in a wedge shape, the end rowhouse conforms to the angles of the lot. The rowhouse extends to the rear with a two-story, two-bay kitchen wing added during the early twentieth century. The interior was remodeled around the same time with few remnants of original finishes surviving. One of the more interesting features is a gas jet imbedded in the plaster wall of a second floor bedroom. The presence of the gas jet coincides with a short article that appeared in The Sun on October 27, 1857, which announced

...the citizens of Annapolis are making preparations for the accommodation of the approaching Legislature. It will be of interest to the usual winter visitors at Annapolis to learn that Messrs. Walton, of the City Hotel, are completing some improvements, containing additional rooms. They have also erected gas works, and will have burners in every room in their extensive and attractive house. Col. Walton has fitted up an elegant & expensive restaurant on St. Francis (sic) Street, nearly opposite the City Hotel, which will, no doubt, become a favorite resort during the winter.

John Walton, proprietor of the City Hotel between 1848 and the late 1860s, financed the rowhouse block in an obvious plan to expand accommodations at this long-time Annapolis hotel, created by George Mann after the Revolution. Towards the end of John Walton's life, the city hotel proprietorship was reorganized with the Walton brothers, Edward, Henry, and John Randolph, assuming full control. This partnership, however, did not last beyond their father's death in 1871. John Randolph Walton assumed personal control of the hotel for several years, but he was forced to advertise and sell the property. William H. Gorman and Luther F. Colton purchased the City Hotel property in 1876 for $14,500. The City Hotel remained in operation until the late nineteenth century. After Luther Colton's death in 1884, the hotel was closed. During the last years of the nineteenth century, the old hotel was used as a tenement. In 1900, William H. Gorman and Lydia F. Colton, Luther's heir, sold the three-story Flemish bond brick tavern building to the Masonic Lodge #89 and the rowhouse block was transferred shortly afterwards to Weems and Grafton D. Ridout. The rowhouse block remained intact during the Ridout and related McFadden ownership, which lasted until the early 1950s. The rowhouse block was subsequently divided into individual units and sold separately. In 1951, Claire Franklin Valentine purchased 150 Conduit Street and retained the title until 1994.

Prepare both a summary paragraph and a general description of the resource and its various elements as it exists today.

The two-story, one-bay common bond brick house that stands at 150 Conduit Street is the end section of a six-unit rowhouse block that is located on the northeast corner of the intersection of Duke of Gloucester and Conduit streets in the center of Annapolis, Anne Arundel County, Maryland. The house faces west with the gable roof oriented on a north/south axis. The house abuts 152 Conduit Street on the north side.

Dated to 1857, the two-story, one-bay, pink-painted brick house is supported on a stone foundation with a partially excavated crawl space under the main block. The house is covered by a medium pitched gable roof sheathed partially in tin and partially in slate. Attached to the back of the main block is a two-story, two-bay by one room plan kitchen wing dating to the early twentieth century.

The west (main) elevation is one bay wide five-course common bond wall with a partially glazed door topped by a single-pane transom. The doorway is framed by a beaded surround, and it is sheltered by a single story Tuscan columned, hip roof porch. The ceiling of the porch is sheathed with narrow tongue-and-groove beaded boards, and a rectangular baluster handrail stretches between the Tuscan columns. The second floor is marked by a single, one-over-one sash window flanked with louvered shutters. Trimming the base of the roof is a corbelled brick cornice.

The south gable is exposed to Duke of Gloucester Street and it is marked by pairs of widely spaced two-over-two sash windows on the first and second floors. Each window is flanked by louvered shutters that swing on shutter hardware. The windows flank the wide, interior end brick chimney. The gable end is finished with a parapet that rises above the roof level.

The east (rear) wall of the brick rowhouse is largely covered by the two-story, two-bay kitchen wing. Dating from the early twentieth century, the kitchen is supported by a brick foundation with a fully excavated cellar. The exterior is sheathed with aluminum siding, and the shed roof is covered with tin. Two-over-two sash windows light the first and second floors, and each window header is trimmed with a small crown molding.

The first floor interior has been remodeled over the years with the original two room plan consolidated into one room. The front fireplace has been blocked, whereas the rear fireplace remains open and is framed by a neoclassical style mantel. An enclosed staircase rises against the north wall and has a small closet accessed through a five-panel door framed by a bulls-eye block surround. A bulls-eye block surround also frames the door into the kitchen, which is trimmed with beaded board wainscoting. A modern rear door is topped by a single-pane transom, and the entrance is framed by a bulls-eye block surround. The cellar stair is located against the north wall behind a modern six-panel door. The cellar has circular sawn, cross-braced joists. The braces are fastened with mature cut nails.

7.1 DESCRIPTION

City Hotel Annex, AA-1268 i 290

150 Conduit Street

Annapolis, Anne Arundel County, Maryland

The second floor was partially reworked around the turn of the twentieth century as well. The upstairs of the main block is divided into two rooms. The fireplace in the front room is blocked and the hearth patched. Directly adjacent to the former fireplace is a small closet accessed through a beaded board-and-batten door. The inner doorway between the two rooms is framed by a different sort of molding. A wide convex round is framed by a square edged molding on each side. The door molding frames a movable single-pane transom as well.

The back bedroom is plainly finished with a the fireplace blocked as well. One of the more interesting features in this room is a small gas jet buried in the east wall. An adjacent closet is entered through a four-panel door framed by a bulls-eye block surround.

The rooms in the rear wing are finished in plain fashion with bulls-eye block surrounds framing four- or five-panel doors.
