Prepare both a summary paragraph and a general description of the resource and its various elements as it exists today.

The Discovery is located approximately 100 feet north of the intersection of Beards Point Road and Riva Road. The entrance to the Discovery is on the west side of Riva Road. The house is situated on a steep hill up a long gravel drive. In the summer it is obscured by trees.

This plain two story frame house has a steeply gabled roof with a wide simple box overhang. There is an interior chimney set at each end of the house and another exterior at the rear of the south gable end. The interior chimney on the southern end is built off center to the rear of the ridge. The opposite chimney is centered on the ridge and its bricks and mortar appear to be later. The exterior chimney is also brick and is a modern addition.

The east or front facade has three bays. The main body has been modified by a central projection with a nearly flat roof. The first floor area of this addition is a screened porch set on a concrete slab. The second level of this addition has an enclosed chamber in its central area. This is surrounded on three sides by an open porch with a plain railing. The front portion of this open porch overhangs the screened porch.

The main entrance into the house has a narrow fifteen-pane glass door with a fixed two-light transom. The windows on either side are within the porch area. They are six-over-six as are the second floor windows on the front. A door on the south side allows entry to the open porch.

The south elevation has two six-over-six windows on each floor. the first floor window on the southeast corner is larger than the other three windows. The exterior Chimney is located adjacent and to the rear of the window on the left side.

The rear or west facade has three bays. However, two thirds of the rear now has a shed-roofed, one story addition, which extends to the south corner. The southwest portion of this is open and is supported by an untrimmed cedar log. The remaining area forms a sheltered entryway to the rear door as well as a small service room beyond. This entry has a door on its south side flanked by an eight-paned fixed window on each side. The rear windows are two sets of paired, out-swinging, eight-paned, casement windows. To the left is a six-over-six window. There are three asymetrically spaced windows on the second floor.

The north side of the house has the same window arrangement as the opposite gable end; these windows are identical six-over-six. The foundation in this area is exposed for about eight inches and shows a mixed stone construction with corner brick piers.

Prepare both a summary paragraph of significance and a general statement of history and support.

The whole exposed area of the exterior now has asbestos shingles. However, the outside wall of the rear entryway shows the original weatherboards. The wall to the north of this shed addition has a broken shingle exposing German siding. The roof is covered with asphalt shingles. The boxed-in overhang has circular saw marks.

The plan is a central passage type with living room, dining room and kitchen on the first floor, and three bedrooms plus bath on the second floor. In addition, a screened porch extends across the front with a bedroom above, plus a service room and entryway are at the rear. It appears that the original house was very small, consisting of a side passage and one room on the first floor with two rooms above. Later the living room was added along the north side with a bedroom on the second floor. The original room on the south side was partitioned and the hall blocked at the rear to create a kitchen. A shed-typed addition was added to the rear to create the entryway and service room. Recent additions include the front screened porch with bedroom above and a bath partitioned from the upstairs north bedroom.

Along the north wall of the passage, a narrow single flight of stairs rises to the second floor. The balustrade is very plain and completely encloses the stairwell. The rail abutts the wall on the second floor where the door molding has been cut to fit around the rail. The newel posts are simple rectangles with flat tops. There are two square balusters per riser. The rail is slightly rounded. A closet was added to the left of the stairs at the rear of the hall. It appears the trim for the doorway was reused because there is a ghost of a box lock. Doorways from the passage lead to the living room on the north side and to the dining room on the south side.

The south wall of the living room also has a doorway to the kitchen. Both doors are four raised panels with box locks, with wide wood thresholds. Centered in the north wall is an interior chimney with a thimble. It is flanked by windows in the east and west walls. The floor is of uniform width boards. The ceiling is acoustical tile. The door and window trim in the living room and the bedroom above is more elaborate than the trim in the remainder of the house. It is Greek Revival style with bulls eye corner blocks. The baseboards are wide with an ogee molding on the top and quarter round toe molding.

The dining room is located to the south of the passage. The rear (west) section of the room was partitioned with modern material to create the kitchen; this wall cuts into the mantel of the fireplace. The fireplace which would have been slightly off center on the south wall of the room has an interior chimney. It has an old-brick hearth. The original opening has been reduced in size with ceramic tile. It has a plain beaded surround. The pilasters are simple boards, beaded on both sides. The fascia board is plain and beaded. The mantel shelf is a plain rounded board.

The walls and ceiling in the dining room have been redone with drywall. The floor, as well as the floors in the hall and kitchen have been tiled. The doorway from the hall has ghosts of hinges and a box lock. All the window and door trim on the first floor, except in the living room, is made with plain boards which butt at the corners. All the baseboards, except in the living room, are plain boards that vary in width.

The kitchen is a mid-20th century style. On the west wall is a door to the rear entry-porch. The door has three horizontal panels at the bottom with a large single light. To the right is a door to the service room. It has five horizontal raised panels and a box lock. At the northeast end of the kitchen is a closet built under the stairs. It has a plywood door with latch lock.

The second floor consists of the central passage with the stairwell, a large bedroom and bath on the north side, two smaller bedrooms on the south side and a bedroom on the east side above the screened porch.

Generally the larger bedroom has the same window and door trim as the living room except for the closet doorway in the southwest corner, which has plain boards with butt corners. The door has four raised panels with a box lock. To the left of the closet is a doorway to the bath. In the center of the north wall is an interior chimney with a thimble flanked by windows. The baseboards are plain with a toe molding. The walls are papered over plaster. The floors in all the second floor rooms, except the bedroom above the porch, are uniform width, thick boards. In the ceiling of this bedroom is an opening to the attic. It was observed that there had been a fire in the attic and the burnt timbers are still in place and plywood sheathing has been applied to the exterior. According to the owner, this fire occurred in 1929.

The walls and ceiling of the bedroom on the southeast side have been redone with drywall. The window and door trim in this bedroom, as well as in the other small bedroom, consists of plain boards with butt corners. An extra board has been added above the top trim so that the top trim extends to the ceiling. The bedroom does not have a door, but there are ghosts of hinges and a box lock.

The bedroom on the southwest side has not been redone; it has wallpaper on the walls. The door from the hall has four raised panels and a box lock.

At the west end of the hall at the top of the stairs is a window. Opposite it, in the east wall, is a door to a recently constructed bedroom above the porch. This door was probably originally a window. The walls are paneled; the ceiling is acoustical tile. In the southwest corner is a closet. To the left of the closet is a door to an open porch above a section of the screened porch. The door has two panels at the bottom with three horizontal lights on the top.

A trap door in the floor of the rear entryway leads down to a dug out earthen basement. There are seven steps with open risers. The stairwell walls are lined with local ironstone and fossil bearing limestone boulders. They flank the stairwell walls for six feet on either side. The current resident relates that in his youth this area served only as a root cellar. In recent times the dug out area has been enlarged just enough to accommodate heating and plumbing equipment.

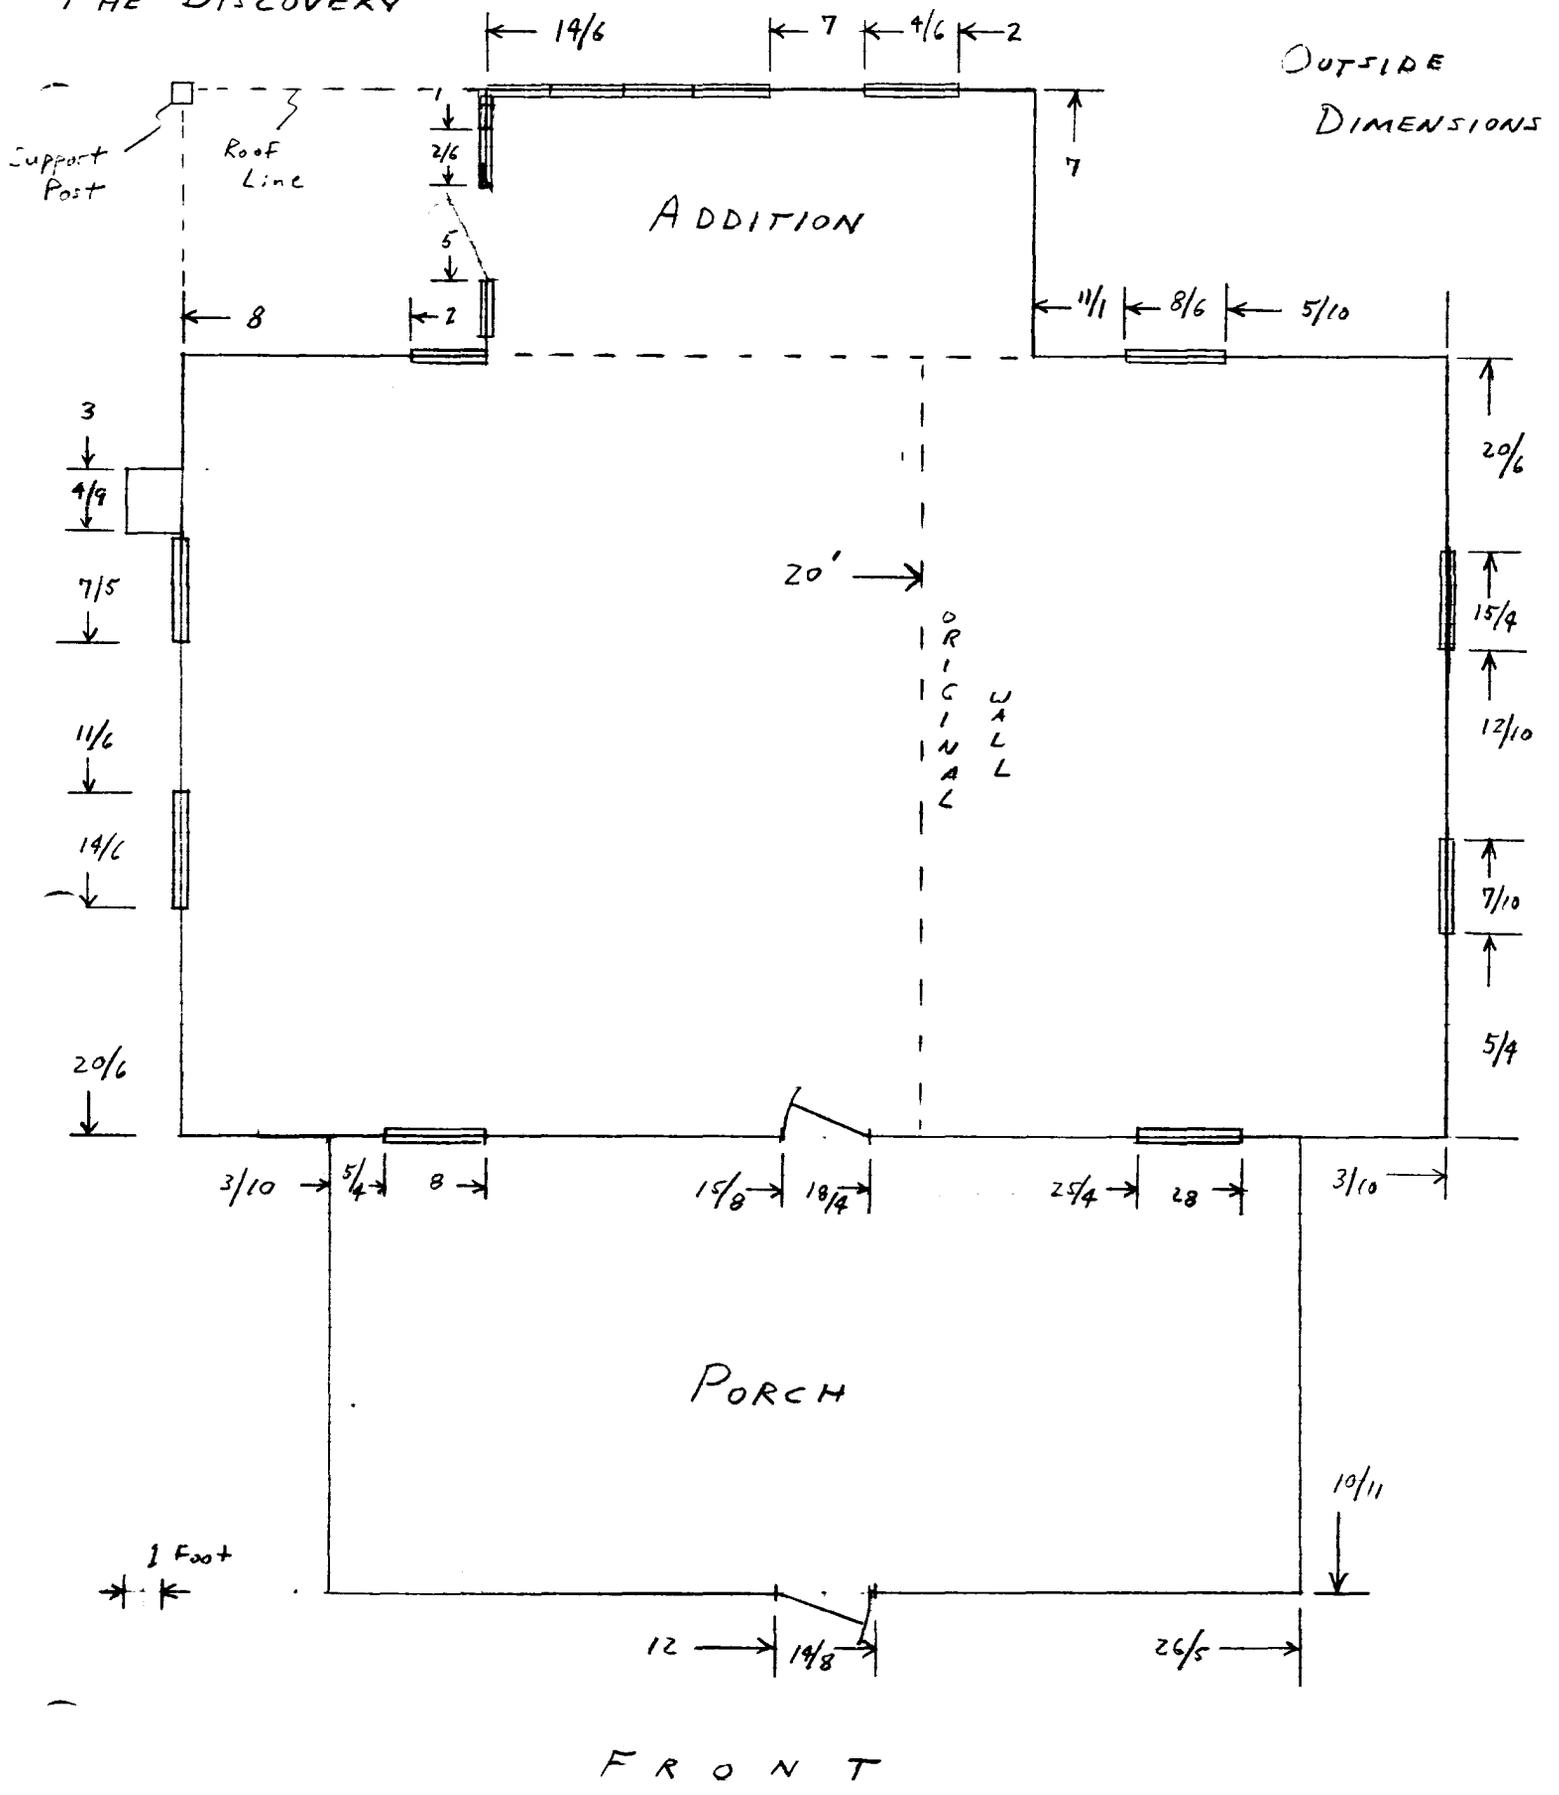

The cellar reveals that the original house had been enlarged by approximately a third. The older section was constructed on hewn, six inch by seven inch, sills. Upon these were set pine log joists (two feet on center) which still retain their bark. Only the top of these are leveled off to support three inch wide flooring boards. The floor boards have a very rough underside.

Closer examination of the unexcavated area to the north reveals a different type of joist. These are gang sawn and apparently reused lumber since they retain the white marks of earlier lathing and plaster and have nails protruding. Flooring in this area has a more finished underside. Where it is possible to observe, the sills are supported by brick piers.
