Historic Name:

Date: 1912

Architect/Builder: William H. McElpatrick (New York)

Style (if appropriate):

Description:

This three story high brick building features a large upper story arch and altered first floor storefront. Above the altered brick, glass, wood and aluminum storefront is a blank sign panel. The upper floors are built of rusticated brick flanking the central recessed arch. Brick half columns with plain capitals support a brick compound arch. Within the arch are one over one windows and a plain wood panel at the third floor level. The third floor windows have been painted over and conform to the curved wood frames which form a circle at the top of the arch. Above the arch and blank spandrels is corbelled brickwork and a metal cornice with egg and dart molding and decorative end brackets.

Significance:

Area: Architecture

Level: Local

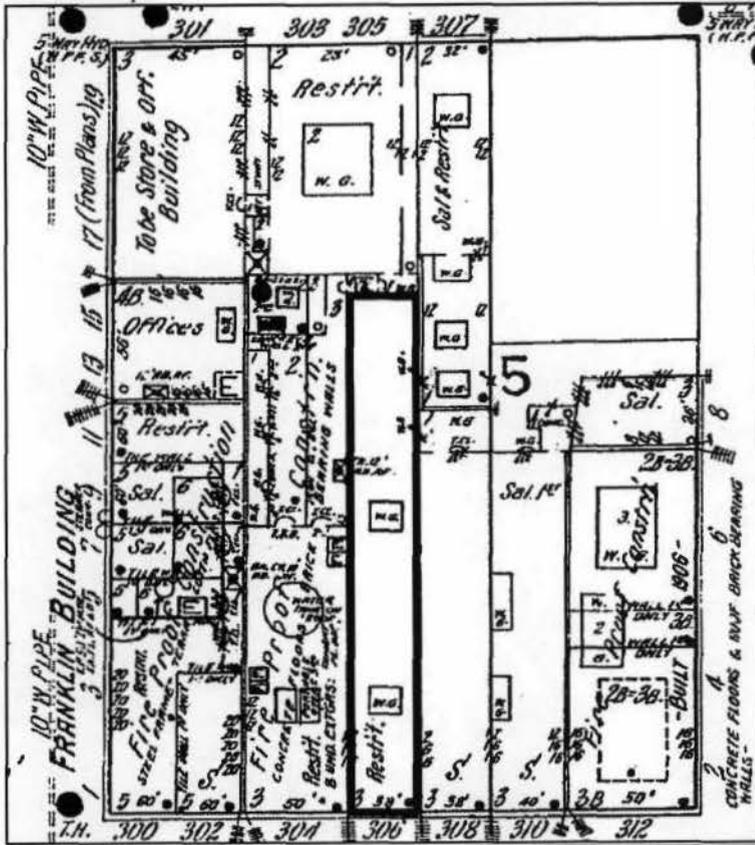

This building is a smaller and simplified version of the adjoining Horn and Horn building. It retains a storefront and central arch but lacks the degree of detailing which makes the Horn and Horn building a landmark structure on Baltimore Street. Despite its lack of individual distinction, it contributes to the historic character of the area. The architect, William H. McElpatrick, was a well-known theatre architect from New York, however, there is no evidence to indicate that this building was ever used as a theatre.
