2 Continued:

This house is part of a contiguous row of buildings situated mid-block on South Bond Street. The building is 2½ stories tall and 3 bays wide. The first floor has a central window flanked by 2 doorways; the left door of which was originally a window. Windows are double-hung and have 1/1 sash with one centrally located dormer projecting from a tar covered roof. The facade is laid in Flemish bond brick which has been painted and is peeling badly. The facade is extremely simple and is ornamented only by a plain cornice.

818 South Bond Street is a typical example of the houses which contribute to the character of the eighteenth-century harborside community of Fells Point.

The maritime character of the district still exists with its small two-and-a-half story houses, the residences of the local seamen, ships' carpenters, sailmakers and other artisans involved in the port's activities. Interspersed among the smaller houses are larger, more elaborate three-and-half-story structures which belonged to the prosperous shipyard owners and ship captains.

Some of the oldest houses in the District are constructed of wide-edged clapboard but the majority are Flemish bond laid brick. Most of the houses date from the eighteenth and early nineteenth century and remain without significant exterior alternation except for those which have had the roof raised to a full third story.
