Description of Property and Justification: (Please attach map and photo)

The Sheridan US Army Reserve Center was built in 1954. It is a long, rectangular block building faced with red brick. The interior of the building is divided in a number of office and storage areas. There is also an appended drill hall which also serves as a recreation area, i.e. basketball court. There is also an ancillary building, used as a classroom and additional office facilities, built in 1958, which is also of similar cinder block construction with red brick facing.

An operations and maintenance building built in 1958 is located adjacent to the USARC, and is constructed of brick-faced cinderblock. The building is on top of a poured concrete slab. This structure is used for vehicular maintenance.

The Army Reserve Centers do not appear to meet the Criteria for Evaluation for inclusion in the National Register of Historic Places. The Reserve Centers do not meet Criteria A or B, as research has not revealed an association with a significant event or individual. The Reserve Centers do not meet Criterion C, as they do not embody the distinctive characteristics of a type, period, or method of construction, represent the work of a master, or possess high artistic values. In very general terms, the buildings' architecture is an extremely minimalist variation of the International or Modern style, prevalent in the U.S. from the 1950s through the late 1970s. The buildings are constructed with flat roofs and make extensive use of concrete. They are devoid of non-essential decoration or ornamentation, and their sterile and institutional design reflects their stark utilitarianism. Overall the Reserve Centers maintain a high degree of integrity, but do not possess any unique or distinctive features, materials, or workmanship.

Finally, no information has been found that would qualify the resource under Criterion D for its potential to yield information important in prehistory or history. The Reserve Centers are not eligible for inclusion in the National Register.
