DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The SLAGLE HOUSE is a two storey brick house in the American Georgian Revival style, dating from early in the second quarter of the twentieth century. Exterior walls are laid in Flemish bond and the hipped roof rises above a modillion cornice. The entrance facade is to the north where the center bay projects with a gable in the roof, and a small porch of the Tuscan order shelters the principal entrance. Above the porch a dropped tri-partite window under a semi-elliptical blind arch lights the stair landing within. A tri-partite window is on either side of the projecting central pavilion in the first storey and three 6/6 windows are on either side in the second. The south facade is expressed as seven bays. A two storey four-bay service wing extends to the west and a one-storey porch extends to the east, wrapping around the southeast corner to meet a glazed sun porch which extends from the center three bays of this facade. Dormer windows have arched windows with "gothick" intersecting muntins in their upper sashes; there are two dormers on either side of the central pavilion on the north, four across the south roof and two on the east end roof. A single arched-roof dormer in each slope of the service wing roof has a single arched sash.

The principal entrance opens beneath the stair landing and a wide hall extends to the sun porch projecting from the south facade. A large drawing room is to the east, a dining room is in the southwest corner and a small library is in the northwest corner. The distinguished interior detailing is rendered in a moderately elaborate late eighteenth century Georgian mode. The stair rises open to the third floor, its moulded rail supported by turned balusters rising above paneled step-ends. The hall walls are paneled as are the dining room walls. The hall mantel is an architrave surround supporting pairs of carved consoles which, in turn, support a cornice shelf. The drawing room mantel has fluted Tower-of-the-Wind columns supporting an entablature having Adamesque urns in the end and center blocks of the frieze; the dining room mantel is similar but with fluting between the paneled frieze blocks. The library mantel is an architrave surround with carved consoles supporting a cornice shelf.

Across a broad north lawn a one storey brick garage-stable faces the house; its south side is sheltered by a one-storey shed-roofed porch. Three garage doors are in the easterly bays and the westerly bay is a small stable; three 4/4 dormers are in the roof and two louvred cupolas are on the ridge.
