DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

FINLAGEN is a stone and shingled frame house of ca. 1895 designed in a picturesque mode to recall the architecture of Tudor England. The first storey is of stone, the second of frame covered with wood shingles; a small cornice at the top of the stonework requires the bottom few courses of shingles to be flared out. The many gables in the steep roof of each elevation are half-timbered and the roof projects beyond them with paneled verge boards, supported by carved brackets. Most windows are groups of three narrow double hung units, mostly now 1/1, but intended to be filled with leaded diamond panes; a few windows retain this glazing.

The principal facade is to the south and the principal entrance is sheltered by a stone porch, a later addition. Most chimneys are massive interior brick stacks but a stone chimney externally on the west side masks the joint between the original house and an early addition in the same style which extended the northwest gable further to the north.

The original working drawings for FINLAGEN by T. Henry Randall, architect, 52 Broadway, New York are preserved within the house. Preserved with them are early twentieth century design studies for alternate porches by J. E. Sperry, architect, Baltimore.

Most of the original interior details are in place. A center hall extends through the house, a small sitting room to the southwest, a large living room to the northwest (the room extended in length as described above), a large dining room to the southeast and a stairhall to the northeast; the pantries and kitchens are in a wing further to the east. All rooms have fireplaces and only the fireplace of the stair hall has been removed. Paneled walls, arched doors, beamed ceilings, the dining room mantel, the arcade at the top of the stair and the massive staircase with its closed string, paneled newels with urn finials, massive turned balusters and moulded rail all bespeak the restatement in 1895 of the transition between the medieval and the renaissance in Tudor England. Some details recall the American Colonial revival, also characteristic of the period of this house.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

FINLAGEN is an outstanding example of the picturesque Tudor revival as interpreted at the end of the nineteenth century (ca. 1895), incorporating certain so-called Queen Anne and American Colonial revival elements. The entire setting is compatible and the house is well documented by the complete set of its original construction drawings preserved within.

Finlagen was one of several homes built by members of the Stewart family on selected portions of their family estate.^{1A} It was constructed in 1895 as a wedding gift from Charles Morton Stewart to his son Charles, Jr., and his new daughter-in-law, Sophia McHenry.^{1B} "A house of English Architecture was built for them on "Cliffholme" acres upon a wooded hill-top overlooking the Valley and under Charlie's care and taste it developed into a beautiful home, where many delightful entertainments resulted from his overflowing hospitality."²

During the Stewarts' long ownership, an addition was made to the north side of the house and in 1928, a large porch was added to the front entrance. This porch was partially removed in the 1960's.³

Charles Morton Stewart, Jr., attended Johns Hopkins University where he was a Phi Beta Kappa. After graduation he entered his father's importing business in Baltimore and when the firm was liquidated in 1914, he joined an investment brokers firm. In the 1930's he was associated with Baltimore's Alexander Brown and Sons. Stewart was a gentleman farmer, a pioneer among scientific agriculturalists, and an accomplished horseman and devotee of the hunt.⁴

He and his wife had two daughters and a son, Charles Morton Stewart, III, who in 1960 four years after his father's death, sold the estate to Mrs. Roberts Adams.⁵ She in turn sold Finlagen to Dr. and Mrs. Gregory Bulkley in 1979.⁶
