

CAPSULE
LEWIS JOB RIDER HOUSE

Anyone doing historical research in the Towson area is likely to find references to the Rider family with one of the most frequent in the 19th century being the calling of Joppa Road the "road to Riders Switch." Present day Riderwood was an important stop on the Northern Central Railway in both this century and the last.

There are more physical remains of the several Rider farms than one might suppose since both early and late subdivision has resulted in fairly dense development. Throughout the Joppa Road - Thornton area, however, there are at least one half of a dozen or more buildings which are the survivors of a period when the Riders were the controllers of this land involved in both agriculture and manufacturing. This house is one of them and is the earliest standing Rider residence.

The original portion of the house is a simple one room down and one up, heated by the fireplaces of a single interior end chimney. It is built of native stone but has been added onto with frame constructions more than once. The Lewis Job Rider House is a part of a lifestyle that left this area well over one hundred years ago and is a document of the very formative years of the Towson area.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Exterior:

The original portion of this house is a two story one room down/ one up stone house with a finished attic. A gable-end roof caps the stone block which is only two long bays wide and the equivalent of two shorter bays in depth. The walls are made of uncoursed brownish fieldstone (gneiss?). There is a large interior end chimney with a stone cap on the east end. (The building faces North-South)

The north facade is partially obliterated by an enclosed porch. Inside the enclosure, however, one can see the original first story. The building was painted white at one time and the probable fenestration of a central entrance with flanking windows has been altered. There are only two windows on the second level with that of the western bay actually being a door. There is no evidence of a second story gallery and oral history relates that there was an exterior servants stairs. The windows are 6/6 sash with thick wooden lintels.

The stone portion is enlarged by a late Victorian frame addition on the west end. This addition gives an over all L-shape plan. Two bays of the addition run with the house (East-West) and two more run North-South. The frame is covered with German siding.

The east end of the stone block is windowless except for a small case-ment in the attic on the north side of the chimney. An unverified report of a dating stone on this facade remains unproven. Thick vines and snow hampered the search (2/14/79).

While the north facade is the present "front", the south facade with its orientation to Jopps Road (approximately 100 yards South) is the original front. The centrally located entrance has a single sash window on either side on the first level that are complimented with a pair of sash windows above. The shed roofed shingled dormers of this side are probably additions.

Interior:

Although there has been alterations, the stone portion has the appearance of the original one-room-up / one-room-down plan.

A small crawl space beneath this main block reveals a stone foundation with walls approximately 2' high. Most original fabric has been covered, however, one log joist tied into the stone walls can be seen. A massive chimney support of field stone is located on the east end. Thick random width flooring for the level above can also be seen.

The first level now contains certain features apparently of Victorian alteration. These include the square newel post, square balusters and plain step ends of the stairway on the north wall.

The most dominant characteristic is the large interior end chimney projecting into the room 22" and the massive fireplace contained within. This fireplace does not appear to be original, however, it is unusual in that it is composed of large, exaggerated stones (The Sun Magazine, January 6, 1974 records these as being volcanic rock). The opening measures 54" wide, 36" high and 29" deep. An iron lintel and wrought iron crane are attached. A very plain mantel shelf measuring 3" x 8" and running the length of the fireplace is supported by the stones.

Random width floor boards are exposed on the second story. For the most part, these boards are continuous from the east end of the room to the middle of the hall. There is, however, a break line in the boards in the northeast corner. This area measures 6½' x 4'. It is probable that a small stairway once occupied this corner and has since been enclosed. Several 18th century as well as Federal period houses in the area, including the Cockey Tavern, have a winding staircase located in the corner next to the fireplace.

A tall fireplace on the east wall has a plain moulding characteristic of the Federal period. The opening measures 25" deep, 36" wide and 37½" high.

A plain surround measures 6½" from the opening.

Some mouldings on this level are plain, rectangular and have a bead on the corner.

The third level, or attic level, has been finished and reveals little in the way of original fabric. However, there are similar mouldings as the second level. Different areas on the trapezoidal ceilings and knee walls reveal mechanically and vertically sawn finishing boards butt joined and laid both horizontally and vertically.

It should be noted that Mr. Frank Williams once saw the number 1797 on one of these third level walls before alterations took place.
