

Name/Address: House, 1432 Railroad Avenue

Construction Date: ca. 1872-1877

Town/Vicinity: Lutherville

County: Baltimore County

Access: Private

Summary Description:

The house at 1432 Railroad Avenue is a modest two-story frame house built in the 1870s. It is one of several houses in a small historically African-American community located directly across the Northern Central Railroad tracks from Lutherville. Number 1432 Railroad Avenue is a two-story, two-bay wide, frame, asbestos-shingle-sided, single-family dwelling with a side-gabled roof clad in asphalt shingles and a brick central chimney. The one-story, three-bay-wide shed-roof porch has been enclosed in screen. The windows are 6/6 wood sash windows and the entrance features a single-leaf half-glass paneled wood door. A two-story gable ell extends from the rear of the house and includes an interior end chimney and a single-leaf door on the north side. The house is set on a solid rubblestone foundation. The current owner says this house was built ca. 1872, and that and this house was her father's homeplace.

Statement of Significance:

Map evidence shows two houses on Railroad Avenue by 1877. This modest house is one of the two depicted on the 1877 Hopkins Atlas, and may date to ca. 1872. By 1898, all of the houses on this street appear on the Bromley Atlas (1898). The houses along Railroad Avenue historically belonged to members of a small African-American community located directly across the Northern Central Railroad tracks from Lutherville. Lutherville was founded as a suburb of Baltimore in 1852. It was centered around the Female Seminary and the Lutheran church, hence the name. Most of the high-style mid-nineteenth century architecture of Lutherville constitutes the Lutherville National Register Historic District (MHT BA-2211); however, these modest houses are excluded from the district boundaries. Little information has come to light about the relationship of this African-American community to the larger community of Lutherville. More than half of the houses that once stood along Railroad Avenue have been destroyed, and all extant houses have been altered in the twentieth century. This house is not known to have been associated with people or events significant to local, state, or national history, nor is it a well-preserved or intact example of its type or period; Therefore, 1432 Railroad Avenue does not appear to satisfy the criteria for listing in the National Register of Historic Places.

Summary

The house at 1432 Railroad Avenue is a modest two-story frame house built in the 1870s. It is one of several houses in a small historically African-American community located directly across the Northern Central Railroad tracks from Lutherville. Little information has come to light about the relationship of this African-American community to the larger community of Lutherville.

General Description

Number 1432 Railroad Avenue is a two-story, two-bay wide, frame, asbestos-shingle-sided, single-family dwelling with a side-gabled roof clad in asphalt shingles and a brick central chimney. The one-story, three-bay-wide shed-roof porch has been enclosed in screen. The windows are 6/6 wood sash windows and the entrance features a single-leaf half-glass paneled wood door. A two-story gable ell extends from the rear of the house and includes an interior end chimney and a single-leaf door on the north side. The house is set on a solid rubblestone foundation.

The current owner says this house was built ca. 1872, a date from a document she has in her possession (not examined by researcher); and this house was her father's homeplace. Map evidence shows two houses on Railroad Avenue ca. 1877, one of which corresponds to the location of this house. This modest house appears to date to the 1870s with mid-twentieth-century alterations. The map evidence supports the construction of the house by 1877. By 1898, all of the houses on this street appear on the Bromley Atlas (1898).

History

Drs. John Gottlieb Morris and Benjamin Kurtze, Lutheran Clergymen, and Charles Augustus Morris, founded Lutherville in 1852. The village was named for Martin Luther; development was focused east of the Northern Central Railway tracks, where the residential plan was centered on the Lutheran Church. In 1853 the Female Seminary was founded on the hill overlooking the Northern Central tracks. The railroad enabled the development of this mid-nineteenth-century suburban community into a popular summer retreat and eventually a year round community. Only after the Civil War is there evidence of the presence African-Americans living freely in the area. Though there were free blacks in Baltimore County prior to the Civil War, no information was located about this particular community. What appears to have been a traditionally African American community developed along Railroad Avenue on the southwest side of the railroad tracks just southwest of the center of Lutherville.

The 1877 Hopkins Atlas depicts two houses located along the railroad tracks just south of Seminary Avenue. The property owner is noted as Samuel Appold, who owned a triangular shaped parcel bounded by the tracks, Seminary Avenue, and the land of John T. Vinson. The two houses may correspond to BA-2885 and BA-2886. By 1898, a row of five house was in place along the tracks, and by 1915, ten houses were depicted fronting the railroad south of Seminary Avenue. The property was located northeast of the coal yard of W.W. Boyce.

8. Significance (continuation sheet 1)

Survey No. BA-2885

Most of the high-style mid-nineteenth century architecture of Lutherville constitutes the Lutherville National Register Historic District (MHT BA-2211); however, these modest houses are excluded from the district boundaries. They were built after the initial development of Lutherville, and represent a small but homogenous community at the fringes of a larger and equally homogenous community. Little information has come to light about the relationship of this African-American community to the larger community of Lutherville. More than half of the houses that once stood along Railroad Avenue have been destroyed, and those that are left have been altered in the mid- and late twentieth century. The neighborhood has remained African American, though only five houses of the ten depicted in 1915 are still standing.
