This small house was a service building for a larger residence demolished in 1950 and seen in the accompanying old photograph. Despite the dwarfed appearance at the rear of the large lot, it is an interesting, simplified version of the Second Empire style.

Primarily of note is the construction of the veranda which, like the original main house, extends around the projecting elevations of the frontal facades. The veranda, which has corniced eaves, is supported on square columns with moulded capitals. The steep lower slope of the mansard roof pitch at its eaves abruptly meets the flattened porch roof pitch. The mansard roof has a cornice between the upper and lower slopes with corner boards at the lower slopes. Heavily moulded lintels are set over each dormer window on each roof plane similar in character to the main house's enriched dormers.
