The Turnbaugh House is typical of the late-19th century houses found in rural villages. It was probably built around 1875 by Dr. Frank England who owned 4 acres of land extending north from his home, the Barko House (q.v.), including this lot. The meathouse survives from the period when such buildings were required to support rural life.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The Turnbaugh House is a two storey frame house dating from the late 19th century. Its principal facade, facing the road to the west, is three bays in length, the principal entrance being in the central bay -- a door with sidelights and transom. A gable centered in the roof emphasizes the symmetry of this house. Windows are 2/2 with narrow beaded frames and they had louvred blinds, now replaced with aluminum. A one-storey hipped-roof porch extends across the west front. A two storey wing extends to the rear from the north end, one long bay in length; a one-storey shed-roofed porch shelters the south side of the rear wing. Single-flue chimneys of brick rise within each of the three gable ends and the roof extends over all walls in a simple, moderate overhang. Exterior walls are covered with aluminum siding.

A square frame meat house with a pyramidal roof and board-and-batten siding stands southeast of the dwelling.

The interior of this house was not examined.
