Willows Store and Post Office

James Henry Soper owned the farm at Willows, and this was his store. His daughter, Mrs. Ruth Soper Wilburne is 82 years old, and she was the Post Mistress for Willows between 1932 and 1961. Like many others, the store served more than just one function for the community and being the Post Office was one.

The mail is one type of communication, but local news and opinions are often transmitted verbally and the country store has long been the forum of rural America.

Last, but certainly not of least importance, are the thousand-and-one items available for purchase (or on credit) at a country store. Prince Frederick and Upper Marlboro are the closest shopping centers to Willows and even after the advent of the automobile, people depended greatly on their local store for practically every item including food, clothes, and fuel.

Architecturally, Willows Store and Post Office is important as a type which was as common in rural America as sky scrapers are in later urban America and split-levels in the suburbs.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The Willows Store is three bays wide, one deep and two stories high. A one-room shed addition is built onto the east end. It is a frame structure with overlap clapboard siding. The gable-end roof has deep cornices and has a steeply pitched central pediment with a small rectangular window in it. Most of the windows are missing in this abandoned building, those which remain are 2/2.

The interior trim, floors, porch supports and other materials have been recently shipped from the building which is otherwise reasonably sound for having been abandoned so long. For this reason, the metal roofed porch is collapsing.

The upstairs is entered by a front door (S) on the west end. Double doors in the center of the south facade are the main entrance and there is a single door in the south facade of the addition. These doors are solid (without glass) and are constructed of tongue and groove which runs diagonally to the door frame.

As long as Mrs. Wilburne can remember, the store was painted red with yellow doors.
