

CAPSULE SUMMARY - HICKS BARN 'A' (CT-1073)

Hicks Barn 'A' is located on Johns Chapel Road in Lower Marlboro. This barn is associated with a small post 1880 one and one half story tenant house and three other tobacco barns. The structure is privately owned. The roof axis is oriented on a north-south axis. The barn measures 40 x 30 feet with an aisle plan, and is constructed of circular sawn lumber and wire nails. There are double doors in both the north and south gable ends, and also on the east and west facades. A center aisle runs the length of the barn. The flanking sections are both divided by ground-laid sills running perpendicular to the barn's axis. In spite of modern materials and construction techniques, this barn does contain some unusual architectural features. Among these are four foot bay spacing, a three aisle plan divided by internal posts and plates. This support system provides extensive bracing and support.

7. DESCRIPTION CT-1073

Hicks barn A is located at the end of John's Chapel Road. It is reached by taking Lower Marlboro Rd. turning left (south) onto John's Chapel road, and following it to the end of the road. A tenant house is located behind the barn to the south. Three other barns associated with the property are located to the west along a farm road that branches off of John's Chapel and runs to the west. The terrain is relatively flat. The barn is oriented on a north-south axis, parallel to John's Chapel Rd. It measures forty by thirty feet, has an aisle plan, and is constructed of circular sawn lumber and wire nails. There are double doors on both the north and south gable ends, and also on the east and west facades.

The barn contains ten rooms and is divided into four foot bays. It is supported by a poured concrete foundation. There is a ten foot wide central aisle that divides the barn. Ten foot wide side aisle are on either side of it. On both sides of the central aisle there is a sill laid on the ground that runs down the axis of the barn. This sill has posts on four foot centers that extend to an internal plate. There are down braces that support the aisles. This system serves to support the tobacco tiers and to add strength to the barn. The posts are separated into four foot bays and half-lapped against the top plate that is formed of two by four inch boards nailed together in an inverted L shape. All the rest of the joints are toe-nailed with wire nails.

Vertical wall siding with hinged ventilation doors covers the exterior. The rafters are on four foot centers and rest on a flat false plate. The roof is covered with standing seam metal. Four windbraces and four collars support the roof. The tier poles are circular sawn and separated by forty-one and one-half inches vertical distance.

8. SIGNIFICANCE CT-1073

This barn dates to the mid-late twentieth century. Its aisle plan and construction techniques and materials are consistent with such a date. The three aisle form, divided by internal posts and plates on either side of the central aisle has not been seen in any early barns. It is somewhat unusual. One of the most distinctive and unusual elements in this barn is that, despite its twentieth-century date, the structural bays are separated by only four feet. In addition, there is extensive bracing and support. It appears that the barn was designed to withstand heavy winds and/or carry a very heavy load.

This barn also yields information regarding agricultural history in Southern Maryland. In February 1990, a tobacco barn survey was initiated in order to study the tobacco barns of Calvert County. Until fairly recently, tobacco was the most important farm crop of the county. More acreage was devoted to its cultivation than for both of the next most extensive farm products (corn and wheat). The barns and stripping houses related to this "Tobacco Culture" are widely recognized as the most common element on the rural landscape. These structures are also the most threatened, as the market for tobacco declines. They seem to have, at present, only limited capabilities for re-use. Many barns and stripping houses now stand empty. The purpose of this survey has been to gather information and document a wide sample of these structures before they disappear from the landscape.
