DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

This house has been considerably changed in appearance from the days of its construction soon after the Civil War. As can be seen in the color slide of this house that is a copy of an earlier photograph, the house was originally a two story log dwelling that consisted of only one principal block. To the front of the house (east) was attached a small shed porch, and a smaller shed lean-to, perhaps serving as a storage room, on the northern side. Along the southern side, facing towards the Patuxent River which probably could be seen from this point when the land around it was under cultivation, a shed porch had been built.

The log walls were not sheathed with weatherboards, as were the other log houses in Ben's Creek. Like them however, it had a three bay facade, arranged with bilateral symmetry, and had one room downstairs, and another (perhaps two) upstairs. A tall chimney with a stone rubble base ascended the western side (rear)

One of the more unusual features of the interior was the presence of a trap door, which led down into a cellar. Most of the log houses that have been survived in the region of southern Maryland do not have cellars. Instead, outbuildings were used as storage facilities.

For further descriptions of this house, see those of Historic Sites Surveyor Wayne Neild.

According to local oral informant, Blanche Wilson, this log house was built as the residence of her grandparents, Mr. and Mrs. James Wilson. It was built soon after they had acquired their freedom from slavery. Its primary significance is that its log construction is a continuation of the earlier forms of house building by slaves, but its two story height and large windows, among other features, reveal the improved housing conditions that freedom and landownership brought.
