STANFORTH HOUSE

Although altered by the addition of a long shed dormer at the roof level, this Federal house is pleasing for its simplistic detail. Five bays in length, it is of two (now two and one half) story height with a single exterior chimney at each end. The exterior walls are sheathed with asphalt shingles.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Lowry's Reserve is an L-shaped gable-roofed frame dwelling. It consists of a two-story, five-bay-long by two-bay-deep section running east/west, followed by a one-story, four-bay-long by one-bay-deep section running north/south. A one-story one-bay-long later addition stands at the south end of the latter section.

The one-story section was built in the late eighteenth or early nineteenth century. An exterior chimney, serving only the first floor, stands at the south end, now in the addition. On the west side, a 6/6 window to the north is followed by a door and then two 6/6 windows to the south. The same pattern appears on the east, minus the northernmost window. The northern two bays on this side are covered by a recent shed-roofed bathroom addition. Two shed dormers holding 6/6 sash light either side of the loft. This section rests on a stone foundation.

The floor plan consists of a hall and parlor on the first floor with a winding enclosed staircase in the northeast corner leading to two chambers in the loft. A closet is situated under the stair.

Little original woodwork remains in the earliest section. The mantel is similar to the one in the 1840's section, but simpler. The stair panelling and parlor architraves include 1840's Greek ovolo moldings. The hall architraves were replaced by the same moldings as in part #3. The newel post and cap are similar to, but simpler than, those in the 1840's section. Only the simple beaded baseboard and chair rail in the parlor seem to be original.

The western three bays of the two-story section were built in the 1840's as a side-hall, single-parlor dwelling. This building features doors in the eastern bays of the north and south sides. All other bays on these two sides hold 6/6 sash. The west gable end was unlighted. Two gable dormers containing 6/6 sash presently light either side of the attic. All windows on the north side are flanked by louvered shutters. An exterior chimney built in 5:1 common bond rises in the west end. It serves both floors before its shoulders step in to a narrow stack. This part of the house rests on a low fieldstone foundation.

The woodwork in this section is exquisite. This house displays some of the finest and earliest original corner block trim in Calvert County. In this case the moldings are composed of a finely cut Greek ovolo & astragal on either side of a central half-circle profile. This is used for all architraves, corner blocks, and the mantel pilasters. Later examples of trim employing corner blocks are far coarser and more bulbous. The mantels include deeply cut Greek ovolo moldings and an undecorated central panel. The stair's newel post reflects the earlier tradition of a slim rounded post whose cap is formed by the rounded end of the banister. This is one of the latest examples of this type of stair. Later stairs include the bulbous posts of the Victorian era. The side of this stair is panelled, and a closet is provided underneath. The scrolled stepends are also transitional. They have more detailed scrolls than the earlier simple curves, but do not include the fancy cut-out work of later jig-sawn examples. These hand-cut boards are slightly thicker than the later boards, yet are slimmer than the earlier ones. In the construction under the stair handsawn members joined with cut nails, and riven lath are visible.

This stair runs straight to a landing before its return. The second floor plan is the same as the first floor. A winding stair to the attic appears in the northeast corner of the second floor stair hall. In the attic one chamber is partitioned off

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Elements of four architectural periods; eighteenth century vernacular, Federal, Greek Revival, and Victorian; comprise this frame house.

The earliest section was probably built by Joseph Harris Jr. in the late eighteenth or early nineteenth century, although it is possible that his son Alexander Harris built the house as late as the 1820's. Joseph Harris Jr. bought parts of "Lowry's Reserve" and "Bromall" (also called "Brommell" or "Bromwell") in 1801 and 1807. Alexander (b. 1801), a merchant, built the 1840's part before he died in 1847. This finely-crafted section is described as "new and commodious" when the "Harris Farm" was sold in 1853 to William J. Belt. This property was held by members of the Bowie family from 1856 to 1954. Perry Van Vleck renovated the house in 1971.

A tombstone standing northwest of the house eulogizes the three generations of Harrises who owned Lowry's Reserve.

The north, or main, door on the first floor is flanked by three-pane sidelights over molded panels. This is topped by a transom containing diamond-shaped leaded glass panes.

Part #3, a two-story section with one room on each floor fills in the corner of the "L" between the two other parts. Two 6/6 windows appear in either floor on the north and east sides. Another 6/6 window occupies the western bay on the south side of the second floor. Two gabled dormers containing 6/6 sash light either side of the attic chamber. The two-story exterior chimney at the east end is built in 7:1 common bond. Brick piers filled in with fieldstones support this section of the house.

The woodwork in part #3 of Lowry's Reserve displays corner block trim, but with a completely different molding from part #2. This molding is composed of two bulbous curves meeting in the center. The mantels are very plain, distinguished solely by quirk-ogee trim.

The doors in all sections of Lowry's Reserve contain six shallow panels each. Those in the two-story part employ the ubiquitous Greek ovolo and astragal molding, while the simpler doors in the earlier section display only the Greek ovolo.

Determining the building dates and sequence of Lowry's Reserves' three sections is quite difficult. Only the 1840's section can be pinned down to a specific decade.

The 16' wide early section of the house is unequally divided into a 12' long unheated hall including a corner stair; and an 18' long parlor with a fireplace. By being small and unheated, the stair hall is not the true half of the recognized hall and parlor plan, yet it is longer than a simple side stair hall needs to be in such a small house. With little datable woodwork and no nails available from original structural positions, only the framing of the house is left as a dating device, and that provides only a general date range. The only accessible nails are those holding the floorboards in place in the knee wall crawl space. Several of these are distinctly cut nails, while a few other incomplete examples could be either wrought nails or, more probably, battered cut nails. If, as is likely, these are original nails, then the earliest building date is the 1820's. All construction members are hewn and hand sawn. The eaves construction includes a flat false plate. The floor joists are lapped over and mortised into the sills. These features are compatible with an 1820's building date, although they do not preclude an earlier or later date. Some reframing of the floor at the chimney end, using cut nails and re-using a beaded joist; and the rebuilding of the chimney do not provide dating evidence.

There is no structural evidence visible to suggest that part #3 was built before the 1840's section. The double thickness wall between this room and the stair hall on both floors indicates that one side was added to the other. That the one-room part was added in the 1860's is suggested by the later moldings on both floors and the attic construction including hand-sawn members and cut nails, which would still have been used at that time. Also, the 7:1 bond of the chimney is a later pattern than the 5:1 bond of the 1840's chimney.

This is a rather high, long, and narrow house of 1800 or later. The house is five bays wide and two deep with a protruding 2-1/2 story ell at the rear. The A-roof of the main house slopes from front to rear. There is a chimney at each end of the house. The chimneys are separated from the wall above the second story level. All of the windows are 6/6 sashes. The central door has an overlight and sidelights. A porch C. 1920 covers the door. One huge shed dormer of recent construction runs the length of the roof. The interior has much of its old panelling. The doors are old and many have their old brass locks. The chair rails on the downstairs rooms are beaded on both top and bottom. The stairhall is intact with all its old panelling. The stair-case wall is panelled. The staircase has scrolled step ends, square balusters and a turned newel post which once had an ivory ha'penny set in the top. This stairhall is very lovely and beautifully proportioned. The panelling appears to be cherry and is well done. At present the Stanforth House is deserted and prey to vandals. The doors are open and rain is damaging the ceilings. Something should be done to preserve this tasteful and well-proportioned house. DETERIORATING
