Essex Lodge is a three story Italianate brick building of five bays in length. Above the first and second floor windows and door are segmental arches. The windows of the first floor facade are floor length and the center door has a semicircular fanlight divided by crude spindles. A door above appears to have led onto a second floor porch which no longer exists. The present porch has plain doric columns and a sloping roof. The cornice has elaborate brackets and dentils and a wood molding surrounds the house beneath the third floor windows, connecting the long brackets of the cornice and thus incorporating the small third floor windows within the cornice. Behind the house, connected to its southwest side is a two story 18th century brick structure of two bays having 9/9 sash on both stories.
