The Scott Log House
Port Tobacco Vicinity
Private

c. 1900

This one story, three bay log house was built rather late in time for a log house in the region by a family of black landowners, the Scotts. It followed the traditional plan of one room downstairs, and one up.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

This one story house, in rather shabby condition, consists of three sections; an original and principal log block; an added frame shed room in a lean-to design; and a recent one story cinder block section added to the opposite gable end. The house is plain to an extreme. It is surrounded by fields, with no signs of gardens for plants or vegetables around the house. In front of the shed lean-to is a well. The principal block has no porch. The log walls were sheathed with weatherboards, and are now covered with tar paper siding. The original wood shingle roof is covered with tin. On each gable end ascends a brick chimney.

The interior of the log block consists of one room downstairs, and presumably another upstairs. Permission was not granted by the tenant occupants to enter the house.

BUILDER/ARCHITECT

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

According to Mrs. Margaret Jamieson, the mother of the two male owners of the house, this dwelling was built by Reginald Scott for his family a few years before her birth in 1910. They were a family of black landowners.

It is unique that this landowning family chose to build a log house rather than a frame one, like so many other black landowners of the period were constructing. No other oral informants have been found to substantiate her account, even the children of the Scotts had only heard" that their parents had built the house, but could not remember specific accounts. One may surmise that the Scotts built a log house in order to cut the costs of house-building and because log houses were the types of house with which they both were familiar. To give the exterior of the house the appearance of the more stylish frame house, the logs were covered with weatherboards.

The interior also followed the traditional plan of one room down and one up.

According to all informants, when the house was occupied by its owners, it did not appear nearly so bleak.
