Prepare both a one paragraph summary and a comprehensive description of the resource and its various elements as it exists today.

The dwelling at 18537 North Sherwood Drive is an example of a vernacular craftsmen/bungalow. The house, scheduled for demolition soon after the survey, is situated in Cobb Island on a grassy level lot with several mature trees including several cedars. The lot is bordered on the south by trees and shrubs. The dwelling shared the property with two small sheds.

This one story frame building was built after 1928. Originally covered in German siding, it is now clad in aluminum siding. The side gable roof is covered with asphalt shingles. Cornices are open with overhanging eaves. An enclosed porch encompasses the eastern and southern elevations and is pierced by several windows.

The eastern façade includes five replacement double-hung metal windows with 1/1 lights. Surrounds are aluminum. Moving clockwise, the southern elevation includes six wood sash six light casement windows. The northern elevation includes two sash double-hung metal windows with 1/1 lights; and three possibly original sash double-hung wood 6/6 lights. The western elevation includes three sash double-hung metal windows with 1/1 lights; and one sash double-hung wood window with 2/2 lights. All surrounds are metal.

The eastern façade includes a metal single leaf, panel and light door.

The dwelling has lost much of its historic character and materials due to later alterations. Most notable is the common late twentieth century practice of enclosing porches to increase living space. *The dwelling was demolished in 1999.

The dwelling at 18537 North Sherwood Drive is found on Cobb Island at the southern tip of Charles County, where the Wicomico Rivers flows into the Potomac. The building is typical of the vernacular bungalow/craftsmen style homes constructed in the resort areas of Charles County during the second quarter of the twentieth century. Common characteristics found on this simple version include a low-pitched roof with open overhanging eaves.

In 1928, Henry T. and Lucy B. Ireland purchased lots 73, 74, 75 and 76 of Section A at Cobb Island that had recently been developed by the Wallaston[sic] Manor Corporation. After Henry's death Lucy assumed ownership and eventually passed the property onto her son Henry Grimes LeDane, who in turn deeded the property to his son George W. LeDane in 1958.

In 1918 Cobb Island, then containing only a few dwellings was purchased by Robert Crain (builder of Mount Victoria, CH-35) a prominent Maryland lawyer and farmer. Crain planned to develop the island into a summer resort and soon hired Washington civil engineer Edmund P. Russell to lay out streets and lots.

Improved transportation stimulated the Island's growth. Previously accessible only by water, by the 1920's a new concrete road called the Southern Maryland Truckline was underway. Completed in 1927, the road extended from Waldorf to Rock Point. A bridge connecting the island to the mainline was also completed in 1923.

These improvements and the growing attainability of automobiles to the middle class stimulated tourism in the region as urban and suburban dwellers attempted to escape to rural seaside retreats. Dwellings like that at 18537 North Sherwood Drive were originally intended to be seasonal cottages and thus usually small, inexpensive and simply constructed.

Today most Cobb Island residents live on the Island year round, and as a result much of this original architecture is being lost to demolition or extensive alterations.
