Hagan's Tavern; The Old White House
Frederick vicinity
Private

Ca. 1790-1830; ca. 1914

Hagan's Tavern is a two-story stone building with four bays and a one-story porch with a 1-1/2 story rear wing located at the northeast corner of Old National Pike and Edgemont Road. It was built possibly as early as 1790, pre-dating the National Road built through the area in about 1807. It was purchased about 1830 by John Hagan, who was the proprietor of the tavern through much of the mid and late 19th century. During the early 20th century, it continued to serve as a restaurant and bar with a rather notorious reputation for rough clientele. Later in the 20th century, the building was an antique shop. Recently restored, the building's white stucco exterior plastering was removed; the nickname "The Old White House", used perhaps during its tavern days and during its use as a restaurant and bar in the 1920's and 1930's, referred to the white walls. This is one of several features in common with other taverns and hotels identified along the National Road, including a wide center hall behind a heavy paneled door, flanked by two rooms with fireplaces, one of which had a built-in cupboard next to the fireplace and a bar. The bar has been reconstructed in a conjectural facsimile of the original based on evidence on the floor boards and historical descriptions and views of similar structures. The windows on the first story are 9/6 and the second story has 6/6 sash. The one-story porch with Tuscan columns was added about 1914. Also on the property is a one-story, much-altered frame store building called the Old Braddock Store, currently used as an antique shop.

Hagan's Tavern is a two-story stone dwelling built about 1800 on the north side of the Old National Pike (U.S. 40A) at Edgemont Road about 2 miles west of Frederick (City), Frederick County, Maryland. The four-bay south elevation has a one-story porch built about 1914 and a 1-1/2 story rear wing. The date of the structure is based on its exterior architectural features and research by the current owner, Mr. Mark McConnell, who has also done considerable restoration of the house. The house is reputed by local tradition to have been built as a tavern about 1790, possibly by James Nixdorf. Although interior access to the house was not possible to meet current survey schedule requirements, further documentation and analysis of the interior features is expected to confirm the information published in a recent Frederick Magazine article regarding the features which typify its use as a tavern. A more accurate dating of the structure should also be accomplished by further research. Certain features on both the interior and exterior are associated with the period 1820-1850. Located west of the stone house is a circa 1914 frame store building with a parapet facade which has been extensively remodeled as an antique store.

The tavern has field stone walls which were covered with stucco during much of the 19th and early 20th centuries and painted white, a typical technique of drawing travelers' attention to inns, taverns, and toll houses along the National Road. The stucco has been removed from the west, south, and east elevations, but remains mostly in place on the north elevation of the main section. The south elevation has four bays and originally had two doorways in the inner bays. The westernmost door was converted to a window at a date not determined. The windows are 9/6 with louvred shutters on the first story and 6/6 with shutters on the second story. According to Mr. McConnell, the shutters were installed in about 1914, a probably true event since the original shutters in a late 18th or early 19th century building of this type would likely have been solid, raised panel shutters. The sills are wood. The remaining doorway has a paneled soffit and a high, three-light transom above a heavy, 6-panel door. Mr. McConnell rebuilt the raised panels in the upper four sections, which had been replaced with glass during the early 20th century. The original raised panels remain in the bottom two panels. A large brass knocker is centered on the door. Above the doorway is a wood lintel, which also appears above the converted doorway to the left.

The height and width of the doorway are, in Mr. McConnell's opinion, one of the features which show that the building was erected as a tavern rather than as a dwelling which was later made into a public house. This theory parallels the available evidence on other taverns along the National Road. The circa 1914 porch has a wood deck and Tuscan columns linked by a plain balustrade. A circa 1910 photograph of the tavern published in Frederick Magazine shows the facade without a porch. The roof is a wood shingle gable type, rebuilt about 5 years ago, but using the probable original material of the roof. Interior end chimneys also appear to have been rebuilt in recent years. A painted brick corbeled cornice is one of the exterior features which suggests a date of about 1820-1850; however, the corn

Prepare both a summary paragraph of significance and a general statement of history and support.

Hagan's Tavern is a well-preserved and restored example of an early 19th century stone tavern associated with the National Road, with a high level of integrity and significance under the themes of architecture and transportation. Its stucco covering in much of the 19th and the early 20th centuries gave it its nickname "The Old White House" by which it was operated as a restaurant and bar in the early 20th century and later as an antique shop. This name was often associated with other taverns on the National Road as well, including Motter's Tavern (F-4-30) and the Beachley House (F-4-29), both located on the Old National Pike in the Middletown Valley. A full context evaluation of Hagan's Tavern must await analysis of the interior.

The house may have been built as early as 1790 and is thought to have been a tavern operated by James Nixdorf. Architectural features of the tavern suggest conflicts with documentary evidence and oral tradition regarding dates, leaving open the possibility of construction between 1820-1830. By the 1830's, it was owned by John Hagan. His father Peter Hagan was described in Searight's The Old Pike: A History of the National Road (1894) as having a log tavern on the south side of the Pike near the stone building's location which was famed among wagoners on the road. The current owner of Hagan's Tavern, Mr. Mark McConnell, believes that the stone house may have operated concurrently with the log structure, eventually superceding it altogether. Research by Ann Lebherz in the Frederick County Historical Society revealed that the tavern was still a well-known drinking place during the Civil War and was "patronized" by both Confederate and Union troops in their passages through Frederick County. With the advent of the automobile, the tavern continued to operate and had a notorious reputation during the early 20th century for its rough clientele. Memories of its use during the 1920's and early 1930's suggest it was known as a speakeasy as well as a legitimate restaurant. Later, it was used as an antique store. Mr. McConnell has information regarding several outbuildings which no longer exist, including stables, a summer kitchen, and a bank barn.

could have been added to an earlier building during the 30-year period. The east and west elevations each have two window bays with the 9/6 and 6/6 sash as on the south elevation and 3/3 attic windows.

The 1-1/2 story rear wing has been the most altered part of the house's exterior. It also has the corbeled brick cornice and a replaced wood shingle roof. A modern shed addition with a doorway is attached to the west side of the wing. The east and north sides of the wing are partially obscured by a modern wood fence, but the east side of the wing clearly was built with an extended roof over a probably open porch. The area of the porch is now enclosed and extended, with modern vertical siding, windows, and doors. A wood shingled dormer is located near the junction with the main section. On the north elevation of the main section, the remaining stucco is visible, along with a modern exterior brick chimney.

The interior as described by Mr. McConnell and shown in the Frederick Magazine article has a center hall flanked by two rooms with a chair rail and original molded mantels. In one room, the removal of layers of paint on the wood floor revealed the outline of a bar and built-in wall cupboard flanking the fireplace. Mr. McConnell recently rebuilt a conjectural bar in this location. The feature is one which is approximated in other identified taverns on the Frederick County section of the National Road. Full documentation of the interior is strongly recommended.

Store: The one-story store has a modern sign identifying it as the Old Braddock Store, built about 1914. Mr. McConnell has additional information on the structure which should be incorporated in this inventory form. Its principal features are a stepped frame parapet with molding cornice and board and batten siding facing south. A four-panel center door is flanked by modern multiple pane windows. A shed porch with a composition roof shelters the south facade and has bracketed turned columns. These appear to be modern additions. The east elevation of the building has a modern doorway, now the principal entrance, and a picture window. A modern warehouse extension adjoins the building on the north.
