Description of Property and Eligibility Determination: (Use continuation sheet if necessary and attach map and photo)

The Old Ridge Road was surveyed in 1998 as part of the survey of resources associated with the Civil War Battle of South Mountain, which occurred on September 14, 1862. In 1998, the Old Ridge Road was deemed significant under Criterion A of the National Register of Historic Places for its role in the Battle of South Mountain. Along the Old Ridge Road, where it intersects the Old Sharpsburg Road (Reno Monument Road), the Confederates made their stand against the General McClellan's Union troops advancing from the east. The Battle of South Mountain was the prelude to the Battle of Antietam three days later, on September 17, 1862. Clashes also occurred at Crampton's and Turner's Gaps.

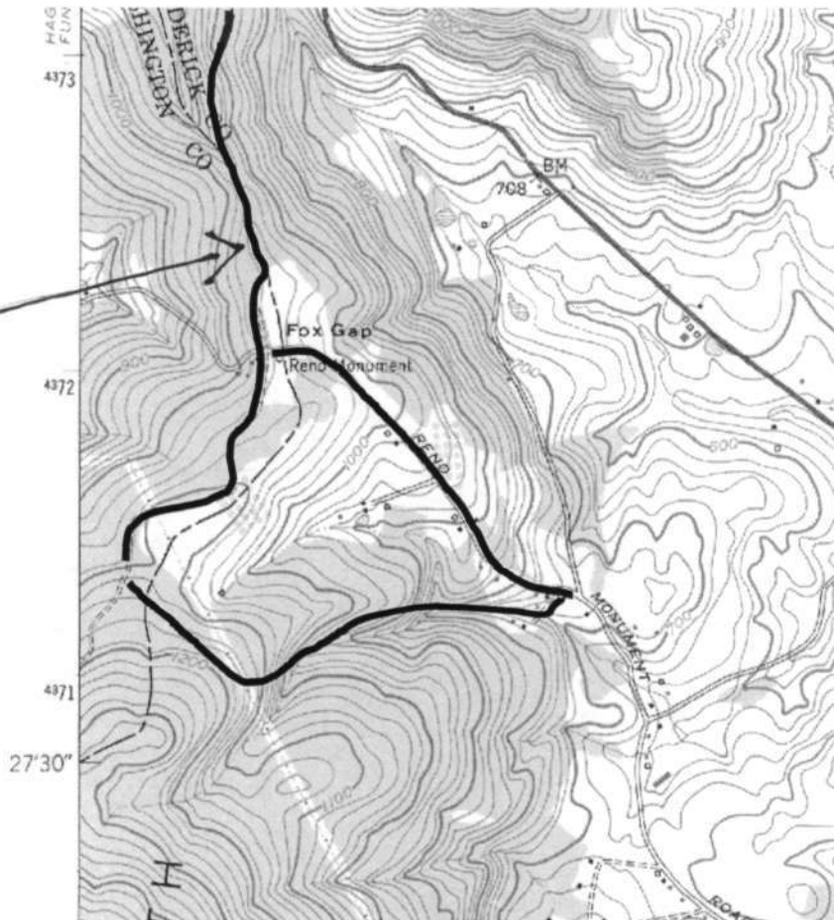

Between 1998 and the present, there seems to have been little or no change to the site. Thus, it is still significant as a contributing resource to the South Mountain Battlefields District, under Criterion A, association with historical events. The association of Civil War personalities with the site of the Old Ridge Road is not sufficient to justify it as significant under Criterion B, association with the lives of persons in our past. There are no architectural structures associated with the site, thus disqualifying it for eligibility under Criterion C. Criterion D, information potential, was not evaluated for this study.

STONEWALL REGIMENT

The 17th Michigan Volunteer Infantry Regiment was among the units of General Ambrose E. Burnside's 9th Army Corps that were engaged in battle here on September 14, 1862. The fighting began around 9:00 A.M. just south of this site. Around noon a Confederate battery opened fire on the regiment, which was supporting Cook's Massachusetts Battery. The 17th held its position for several hours. At 4:00 P.M. the command was given for an assault along the entire Union line. The Confederates came out of the woods to meet the charge at a fence line in the middle of the field, then moved back to the stone walls along the crest of the hill. The 17th advanced and captured the stone walls. Of the 500 men of the "Stonewall Regiment" engaged in battle here, 27 were killed and 114 wounded, many mortally.

This property is included in the survey of resources associated with the Civil War Battle of South Mountain, which occurred on September 14, 1862. The Ridge Road exists today in two distinct sections, north of the old Sharpsburg Rd. (Reno Monument Rd.) to the National Pike (Alt 40) and south from the old Sharpsburg Road to the intersection with the Loop Farm Lane. It's condition runs from trace remnants to hiking trail, to paved road. The Ridge Road is significant for its direct and primary role in the Civil War Battle of South Mountain. It was invaluable to the Confederate defense of Turners and Fox's Gaps, as Union forces moved to dislodge them and continue west to attack the divided and vulnerable Confederate Army. The Confederate ability to hold the gaps through the day on September 14, 1862, allowed Robert E. Lee's Army of Northern Virginia to regroup and prepare for battle near Sharpsburg, west of the Antietam Creek. The Ridge Road in 1862 was a logging/farming road running the ridge of South Mountain south from the National Pike to Lamb's Knoll, a high point on the mountain ridge. It was intersected by the old Sharpsburg Road at Fox's Gap. This road was crucial to the defense of South Mountain by the Confederate forces of General D.H. Hill, allowing the movement of men and artillery between Fox's and Turner's Gaps.

Prepare both a summary paragraph and a general description of the resource and its various elements as it exists today.

The Ridge Road exists today in two distinct sections, north of the old Sharpsburg Rd. (Reno Monument Rd.) to the National Pike (Alt 40) and south from the old Sharpsburg Road to the intersection with the Loop Farm Lane. It's condition runs from trace remnants to hiking trail, to paved road.

The northern section begins on the south side of Alt. 40 where the Appalachian Trail crosses the highway from Dahlgren Road. From here the Appalachian Trail follows the path of the Ridge Road until the Trail leaves the road trace veering to the west slightly. The Ridge Road, still essentially a trail, runs approximately 1 mile until it intersects with Reno Monument Road. The stone wall along the historic Wise Farm north field, where Bondurant's Battery faced the 17th Michigan, still exists today.

The southern section of the Ridge Road is a paved one-lane road. The intersection with Reno Monument Road for this southern section now called Mountain Road, is not the same as the intersection of the historic Ridge Road and the old Sharpsburg Road (see photo, maps). There is some disagreement as to where the original road bed is, but it lies somewhere to the left (east) of the modern road bed. However, historians agree that the old and new roads come together several hundred yards south of Reno Monument Road, just beyond the new road's first curve to the east where it begins to parallel the stone walls. The road then continues to the intersection with the Loop Farm Lane, approximately 1/2 mile in all.

The portion of the Ridge Road discussed in this survey form, from near US Alternate 40, south to the Loop Road totals about 1 1/2 miles in length. Its original function was for access to woodlots and mountain fields near the summit.

Prepare both a summary paragraph of significance and a general statement of history and support.

The Ridge Road is significant for its role in the Civil War Battle of South Mountain. It was invaluable to the Confederate defense of Turners and Fox's Gaps, as Union forces moved to dislodge them and continue west to attack the divided and vulnerable Confederate Army. The Confederate ability to hold the gaps through the day on September 14, 1862, allowed Robert E. Lee's Army of Northern Virginia to regroup and prepare for battle near Sharpsburg, west of the Antietam Creek.

The Ridge Road in 1862 was a logging/farming road running the ridge of South Mountain south from the National Pike to Lamb's Knoll, a high point on the mountain ridge. It was intersected by the old Sharpsburg Road at Fox's Gap. This road was crucial to the defense of South Mountain by the Confederate forces of General D.H. Hill, allowing the movement of men and artillery between Fox's and Turner's Gaps.

On September 13, 1862 D.H. Hill, realizing that the Federals were headed his way from Middletown, sent two brigades under the command of Colonel Alfred H. Colquitt and Brigadier General Samuel Garland, Jr. to Turner's Gap to watch the Federal advance.<sup>1</sup> Colonel D.K. McRae (commanding Garland's Brigade following his death at Fox's Gap) describes the Ridge Rd: "From the turnpike at this point [just below the Mountain House] a road runs along the ridge for about 1 1/2 miles, and at the end of this distance is intersected by a road [the Loop Farm Lane]...between this intersecting road and the turnpike, and at nearly right angles with the latter, runs what is known as the old Sharpsburg road [Reno Monument Road]."<sup>2</sup> Along this road Colonel Colquitt began to set up his line, two Georgia regiments along the northernmost stretch of the Ridge Road just southeast of its intersection with the National Road. Garland's men were placed to the right guarding the flank.<sup>3</sup>

On the morning of September 14th, General Hill sent Garland's Brigade with Bondurant's Battery farther south along the Ridge Road to protect the old Sharpsburg Road at Fox's Gap. When Garland arrived at the gap he learned from Rosser's 5th Virginia Cavalry pickets just how thinly he would have to spread his men along the Ridge Road, both north and south of the old Sharpsburg Road.

Having to stretch as far south as the Loop Farm Lane forced Garland to leave a gap of approximately 400 yards between his and Colquitt's Brigades on the northern stretch of the Ridge Road.<sup>4</sup> On the southern stretch of the road between the old Sharpsburg Road and the Loop Farm Lane "...the brigades frontage covered approximately 1,300 yards. According to the tactics of the day it should have covered no more than 350 yards. There were intervals between every regiment."<sup>5</sup> Clearly, before the day was out reinforcements would be needed to defend Fox's Gap.

The push by Brigadier General Jacob Cox's Brigade from the southeast along the Loop Farm Lane effectively forced the Confederate defenders apart west and north. Cox reported: "...the center of Garland's North Carolina brigade breaking before them [Scammon's Union brigade]...We found that there was a country road behind the wall on top of the ridge...The high knoll on the left was carried, the enemy's center was completely broken and driven down the mountain, while on the right our men pushed the routed Carolinians beyond the Sharpsburg road, through Wise's fields, and up the slope of the crest toward the Mountain House at Turner's Gap."<sup>6</sup> Lieutenant Colonel Thomas Ruffin, Jr. of the 13th North Carolina describes "...the enemy had obtained the road on our right, and were coming down upon us from that direction."<sup>7</sup> General Anderson's Confederate brigade had already retreated to the old Sharpsburg Road. From there Anderson, Ruffin, and Bondurant's Battery all moved north up the Ridge Road to re-establish their defensive line. Bondurant's artillery was set up in the northeast corner of Wise's north field.<sup>8</sup>

During an afternoon lull in the fighting Confederate reinforcements arrived in the form of Drayton's, G.T. Anderson's and Jones' brigades which were placed along the northern section of the Ridge Road. On the Union side came Willcox's, Rodman's, and Sturgis' brigades. With both sides reinforced the standoff continued into the night. The Federals had taken Fox's Gap but were unable to push north to Turner's Gap.<sup>9</sup>

Verbal boundary description and justification

Beginning at the intersection of U.S. Alt 40 and the Appalachian Trail, the Trail follows the original track of the Ridge Road just below the ridge of South Mountain on the east face. The Ridge Road and the Appalachian Trail separate approximately 1/2 mile south, the road continuing along the ridge of the mountain and the Trail veering to the west. The Ridge Road comes out of the woods at the intersection with Reno Monument Rd.

On the south side of the Reno Monument Rd. intersection the Ridge Road continues as Mountain Road, a paved, private access road which leads to Lamb's Knoll Government facility. The original Ridge Road parallels Mountain Road through the woods for about 300 ft. where the paved road returns to the original road at the stone walls. The Ridge Road runs approximately 1 1/2 miles in all from Turner's Gap to the intersection with the Loop Farm Lane just north of Lamb's Knoll.
