The Appolds Victorian House exemplifies late nineteenth century architecture influenced by the Victorian period. Built circa 1890, the house is of frame construction, sheathed in german siding, and rests on a stone foundation. The form of the building, a 2 & 1/2 story house with a center gable and projecting side bays, was typically utilized in vernacular renditions of high-style late nineteenth-early twentieth century architecture. Several small domestic outbuildings are located to the north of the dwelling house. These outbuildings are good examples of small domestic buildings that accompanied a house of this period. The one story round chicken coop is notable as a possible mail-order building.

7.1 Description:

The Appolds Victorian House is situated near the intersection of Appolds Road and Motter Station Road in the vicinity of Rocky Ridge, Maryland. The 2 & 1/2 story house faces south with the principal gable running east to west. Several small domestic outbuildings are located to the north of the dwelling house.

Built circa 1890, the house is of frame construction, sheathed in german siding, and rests on a stone foundation. The gable roof of composition shingling is punctuated by a central gable on the main facade. An exterior end cinder block (replacement) chimney is on the west wall. The house is three bays wide with a central entrance. The building shows Victorian-influenced detailing with a scalloped bargeboard below the cornice, a porch with decorative brackets and pendants, and a lancet window in the central gable.

The principal elevation, facing south, has a symmetrical facade with three bays: a central door opening with sidelights is flanked by 2/2 windows. All openings have segmental arch surrounds. The central gable has a lancet window. A one story, full facade open porch with turned columns is decorated with brackets and pendants in the cornice. The north elevation has 2/2 windows with segmental arches. It is covered by a one story open porch with chamfered columns and bargeboard beneath the cornice. The east and west elevations have 2 single light attic windows and 2/2 windows with segmental arches. A one story, 1 bay wide bay projects from the east elevation with three sides. A 2 story, 1 bay wide bay projects from the west elevation on three sides. The second story has variegated shingling.

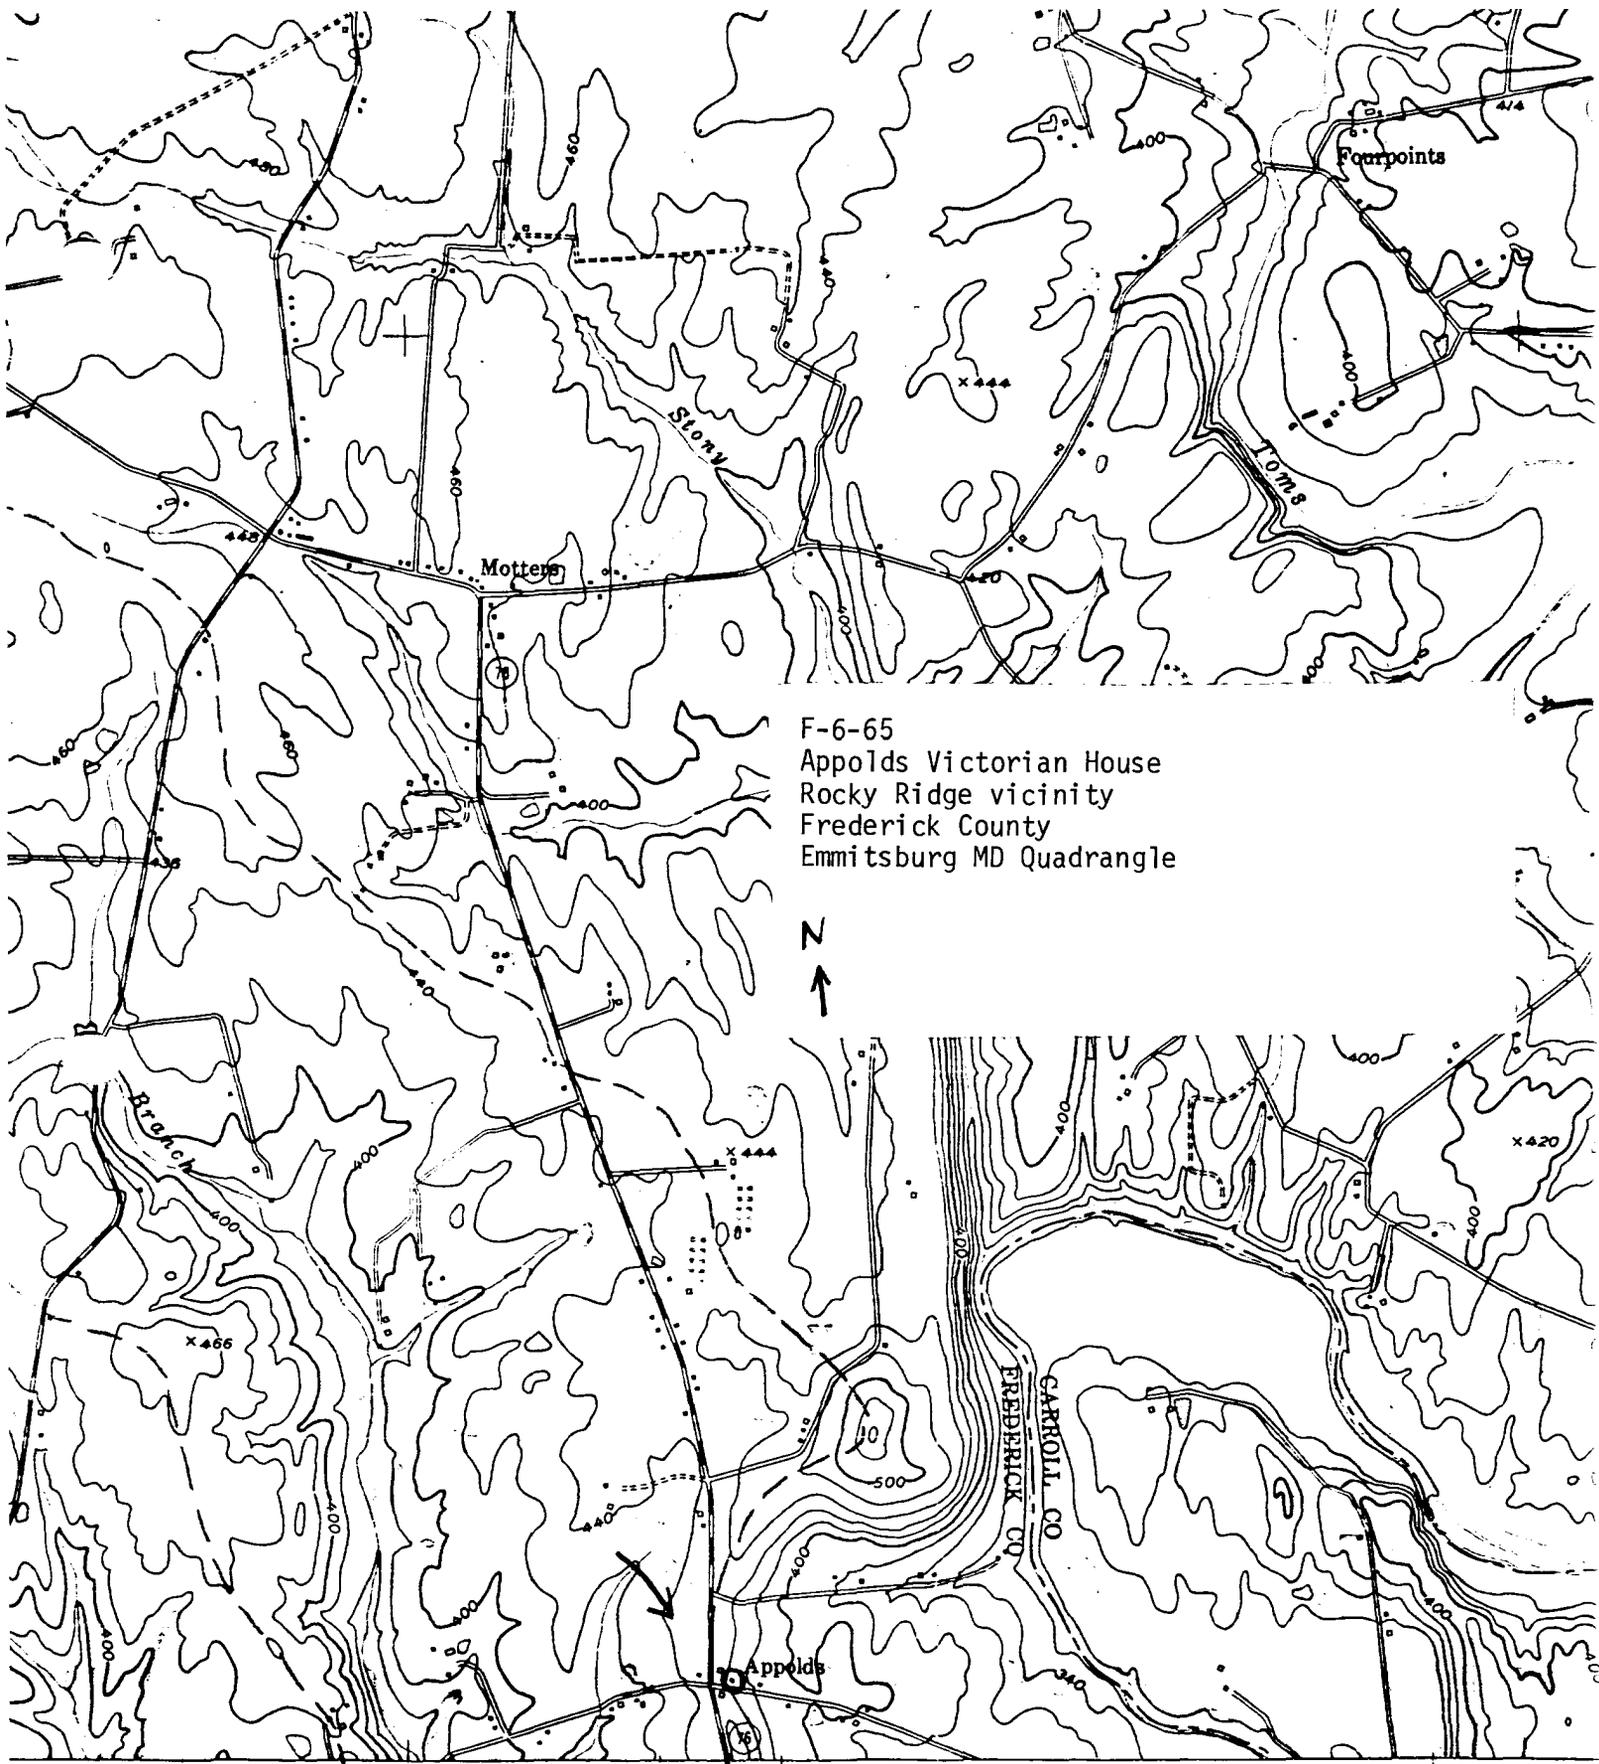

Domestic outbuildings include a one story concrete block garage with a standing seam tin gable roof running north to south. The gable ends are covered in german siding and have a scalloped bargeboard. The door opens on the south gable end. The small cupola sits on the ridge. A one story round outbuilding several feet north of the garage possibly functioned as a chicken coop. It has tongue and groove siding and is covered by a standing seam tin domed roof with a cylindrical vent at its peak. A tongue and groove door is on the south elevation. Behind the chicken coop to the north, a small shed of vertical siding and plywood has a shed roof of corrugated tin. Its door is on the west elevation.

8.1 Significance:

The Appolds Victorian House exemplifies late nineteenth century architecture influenced by the Victorian period. The form of the building, a 2 & 1/2 story house with a center gable and projecting side bays, was typically utilized in vernacular renditions of high-style late nineteenth-early twentieth century architecture. The outbuildings are good examples of small domestic buildings that accompanied a house of this period. The one story round chicken coop is notable as a possible mail-order building.

The historic context of the Appolds Victorian House was originally that of a small crossroads community that owed its late nineteenth century development to the railroad which ran north to south parallel to Motters Station Road. This community is no longer intact, but the house is a representative element of the former village, Appolds. Compared to other resources in similar railroad-oriented communities in the county, this house is typical in form and details and compares favorably in integrity.

The Appolds Victorian House was probably constructed by 1900 and may have had some connection to the railroad which was established through the region in the 1870s. Judging from historic maps and existing resources, a crossroads community referred to as Appolds began to develop after 1873 and into the early twentieth century. The location of the house in close proximity to the intersection was an aspect of this development.
