Frederick Barracks
242 South Market Street
Frederick
Public

Following the general concept of military barracks in North America constructed during the eighteenth and nineteenth century, the Frederick Barracks is a handsome two story, L-shaped stone structure. Listed on the National Register of Historic Places in 1970, the barracks has adapted itself to a variety of public uses: a state armory, an agricultural exhibition hall, a temporary hospital during the Civil War, and finally the first classrooms for the Maryland School for the Deaf. Presently, the building serves as the school's museum.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The two-story stone structure with gallery porches is "L" shaped. An "A" roof covers the structure including the porches.

This structure remains of two original "L"-shaped buildings which, between the two, enclosed a yard. The reputedly older building was demolished c. 1870 to supply materials to erect the Maryland School for the Deaf brick building which overshadows the remaining "barracks."

The longer (north) exterior wall of the existing building and the short (east) exterior wall (the short, base, of the "L") are pierced by occasional small, double-hung sash windows. The interior walls, along the galleries, are regularly pierced on both floors by sturdy doors with six deeply beveled panels, and with double-hung windows that show some early glass panes. Pegged frames with heavy cyma reversa mold surround each window opening; most of the wood trim throughout the structure appears to be early.

The doorways on each floor open into a series of plain, rectangular rooms. At neither level is there an interior passageway. The inter-room door of each room leads directly into the next in line. The interior common-wall between each two rooms are fitted with fireplaces, back-to-back; the stack of each couple rises to just above the ridge pole appearing as a series of wide, squat chimneys.

There are two interior plain, narrow, wooden staircases between the two story levels. Two exterior, plain, wooden staircases rise from the lower to the upper galleries.

This stone structure closely resembles the extensively restored, circa eighteenth-century, military barracks at Trenton, New Jersey, and follows the general concept of military barracks in North America constructed during the nineteenth century.

The Hessian Barracks are located at 242 South Market Street (east side of the street) in Frederick, Maryland, on the grounds of the Maryland School for the Deaf.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

[Ed.: Footnote references are under #9]

Two historians of Frederick, Maryland, Lucy Leigh Bowie (in 1939) and J. Thomas Scharf (in 1882) maintained that the Hessian Barracks were built during the French and Indian War (1754-1763).<sup>1</sup>

The first principal (William D. Cooke) of the Maryland School for the Deaf located on the barracks grounds, in his history of the institution, was unable to date the barracks exactly. He did state: "It is known, however, that they [the barracks] were built during the reign of George II [of Great Britain], and that they were occupied by General [Edward] Braddock and his troops on their route to Fort Dusquene."<sup>2</sup>

Judge T. J. C. Williams, the co-author of the accepted history of Frederick County, stated that the barracks were built following a law passed in 1777. Williams*also mentions a letter dated July of 1775 from John Hanson to Peyton Randolph (The latter Williams names as the President of the Continental Congress.), which referred to the barracks.<sup>3</sup> Unfortunately, Williams gave no source for his statement.

An examination of the published volumes of the Archives of Maryland reveals that the State contracted to build "a" barracks in Frederick in the summer of 1777. This structure was not completed in 1781.<sup>4</sup> A letter from a British officer, a prisoner of war, to Governor Thomas Sim Lee, dated January 30, 1781, reveals the condition of the barracks, then to be used as a prison.

I have the honor to inform Your Excellency, that on the arrival of the British Troops of Convention here, I made a demand of boards and nails to make the barracks habitable for the men and to give them reasonable space equal to their numbers. [sic.] which is so far from the case at present, that one half cannot measure their lengths on the few floors they have.

To alleviate which, had boards, nails and tools been provided, they would have willingly with my authorizing them completed the barracks.<sup>5</sup>

It may be deduced from the aforementioned quotes that the barracks described above were what is known today as the "Hessian Barracks." However, no land record has been uncovered to substantiate this deduction.

The Laws of Maryland, February Session 1777, Chapter X, authorized the Governor of the State to purchase property for the erection of barracks. In August, two months after the State Council had engaged Abraham Faw to build a barracks, Thomas Johnson, the Governor of Maryland, did purchase five-and-one-fourth acres of land in Frederick County to be held in the name of the incumbent Governor of Maryland in perpetuity.<sup>6</sup> However, this five-and-one-fourth acre tract is not the piece of land on which the Hessian Barracks sits today. An early documentation of a barracks on the same grounds of the existing barracks is found in a deed dated April 14, 1820.<sup>7</sup>

French prisoners of war captured during the undeclared sea war with France (1799) and British soldiers taken prisoner in the War of 1812 occupied barracks.<sup>8</sup>

In the nineteenth century the Barracks at this location served several diverse state and community needs. The State of Maryland used the barracks as a state armory under the charge of a state armorer. While the armory was still assigned this building, and with permission from the State, vacant floor space was rented for other purposes. One of the tenants was the firm of Jenks and Ramsburg, which raised silk worms (c.1839-1840)<sup>9</sup>; from 1853 to 1860 the barracks yard served as the Agricultural Fairgrounds.

After the Battle of Antietam (September 17-18, 1862) the Barracks building functioned as a hospital for the wounded from both North and South. Every available space in Frederick from hotels to high schools including the Barracks was taken up for the estimated 4,000 wounded hospitalized there.<sup>10</sup>

The State chose the Barracks grounds for the location of a new school, the Maryland Institution for the Deaf and Dumb (1867). Before the construction of the first building in 1871, the school met in the barracks. The Industrial Department of the Maryland Institution for the Deaf and Dumb continued to use the barracks for a few years after the construction of the 1871 school building. The school's Board of Directors authorized demolition of the western of the two original barracks buildings.

Hessian Barracks
#7 - Description

The west facade of the north-south "L" is a shorter version of its companion wing. Window and door trim is identical to that on the east-west "L".

The south facade of the north-south "L" is marked by three starbolts but otherwise is a solid masonry wall. At the first-story level the stone wall has been extensively reworked. School personnel indicate that part of this wing was converted into a garage and then subsequently remodeled. Beaded rakeboards outline the gable area.

The east facade of the north-south "L" is punctuated by evenly-spaced windows displaying 6/6 sash, pegged surrounds, projecting wooden sills and flat-arched, keystone stone lintels. Most of the windows and window frames are replacement. A stone watertable which follows the rising northward slope of the land further distinguishes this facade.

This watertable continues to run along the north (rear) facade of the east-west "L". This north facade is eight bays wide. On the first story, three raised entrances mark the first, third, and fifth bays from the northeast corner respectively. Windows occupy the remaining bays. Windows also define the corresponding openings of the second story. An additional window is centered between the two easternmost bays at this level. Both window and door frames are replacement but replicate the trim found throughout the structure.

The west facade of the east-west "L" is a solid masonry wall. Beaded rakeboards articulate the gable area.

Large interior brick chimneys rise through the roof ridge between the sixth and seventh bays, the tenth and eleventh bays, at the easternmost bay of the east-west "L", and centrally in the shorter north-south "L". All chimney stacks have been extensively rebuilt.

INTERIOR

Very little of the original fabric remains on the interior due to the variety of uses the building has adapted itself to since its construction. The Hessian Barracks were extensively renovated in 1971.

Hessian Barracks
#7 - Description

The majority of the rooms presently serve as exhibit space for the Maryland School for the Deaf, depicting their history as well as the historical events associated with the barracks. The second floor of the north-south "L" is a private apartment.

Both "L" shaped interiors are divided into a series of plain, rectangular rooms. At neither level is there an interior hallway. A narrow, straight stair is found along the inside of the western gable wall of the east-west "L". A second and much larger dog-leg stairs is located toward the eastern portion of this wing. In the center section a wooden ladder leads to the second floor through a square opening in that floor. The interior common walls between each room are beaded vertical panels and are fitted with fireplaces back-to-back. These fireplaces have been extensively rebuilt. The partition walls in most cases are not original. While some of the interior window and door trim is of an early date, most of the detailing is of recent construction. This is also true for the doors and door hardware. In many rooms the plaster has been stripped from the walls, exposing the unfinished masonry surface.

In two of the rooms on the first floor the ceiling joists are visible, showing early hand-hewn beams. On the second story, one of the rooms in the east-west wing exhibits wide, pine floorboards secured with old nails. The plaster ceiling in this room has been removed, also revealing hand-hewn joists. Some of the upright posts in the roof truss system however are hand-hewn.

This stone structure closely resembles the extensively restored, circa eighteenth century, military barracks at Trenton, New Jersey and follows the general concept of military barracks in North America constructed during the nineteenth century.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The Hessian Barracks located on the campus of the Maryland School for the Deaf in Frederick County (242 South Market Street) is a long L-shaped, two-story stone structure. Its slate gable roof projects along the south wall of the fourteen-bay story gallery porch. A wide flagstone path marks this area at the first-story level. There is no access to the balcony from the ground, although earlier photographs show a stairway in the westernmost bay of the east-west wing. The present porch is of recent construction but in all likelihood some type of gallery has always existed.

This structure was one of two original "L"-shaped buildings which, between the two, enclosed a yard. The reportedly older building was demolished circa 1870 to supply materials to erect the Maryland School for the Deaf's brick building which overshadowed the remaining barracks. This brick structure, an elaborate five-part Victorian building, was torn down in the 1960s to be replaced by the Ely Building/Auditorium.

The first and second stories of the east-west "L" are identical and characterized from west to east by a window, door, door, window, window, door, door, window, window, door, door, window, window, door configuration. The windows are universally 6/6 sash with a beaded and pegged surround outlined by a heavy cyma reversa molding. Further defining these openings are projecting wooden sills and flat-arched stone lintels. Shutter dogs randomly appear on the window trim and suggest that casement-type shutters originally covered the openings. The entrances are framed by a beaded and pegged surround, also outlined by a cyma reversa molding. A flat-arched, keystone stone lintel surmounts the doorways. The poured-concrete door sills replace stone ones. The doors are fashioned of beaded, wide vertical panels. Some of the wood trim window panes and doors appear early. Where they are not, their replacement is a replicated version of the older detail.

A plaque, dated September 14, 1914 and placed by the members of the National Star Spangled Banner Centennial Pilgrimage is centered between the two westernmost first-story doors. It reads:

"These barracks mark the course of the struggle for American independence built in 1777 by the British & Hessian prisoners of the Revolutionary War. Here were detained these taken at battles of Saratoga, Trenton, and Yorktown also the French prisoners captured from the frigate "L'Insurgent" by the Navy in 1799. Also the British prisoners taken in the War of 1812 at Bladensburg and during the attack upon Baltimore at North Point and Fort McHenry September 12-14, 1814, the gallant defense of which inspired Francis Scott Key to write the American National Anthem "The Star Spangled Banner."

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The following statement of significance is taken from the historical information collected for the National Register Nomination Form prepared in 1970. The Hessian Barracks were placed on the National Register of Historic Places on January 25, 1971.

"Two historians of Frederick, Maryland, Lucy Leigh Bowie (in 1939) and J. Thomas Scharf (in 1882) maintained that the Hessian Barracks were built during the French and Indian War (1754-1763).<sup>1</sup>

The first principal (William D. Cooke) of the Maryland School for the Deaf located on the barracks grounds, in his history of the institution, was unable to date the barracks exactly. He did state: 'It is known, however, that they (the barracks) were built during the reign of George II (of Great Britain), and that they were occupied by General (Edward) Braddock and his troops on their route to Fort Dusquene."<sup>2</sup>

Judge T. J. C. Williams, the co-author of the accepted history of Frederick County, stated that the barracks were built following a law passed in 1777. Williams also mentions a letter dated July of 1775 from John Hanson to Peyton Randolph (Williams names the latter as the President of the Continental Congress), which referred to the barracks.<sup>3</sup> Unfortunately, Williams gave no source for his statement.

An examination of the published volumes of the Archives of Maryland reveals that the State contracted to build "a" barracks in Frederick in the summer of 1777. This structure was not completed in 1781.<sup>4</sup> A letter from a British officer, a prisoner of war, to Governor Thomas Sim Lee, dated January 30, 1781, reveals the condition of the barracks, then to be used as a prison.

I have the honor to inform Your Excellency, that on the arrival of the British troops of Convention here, I made a demand of boards and nails to make the barracks habitable for the men and to give them reasonable space equal to their numbers, (sic.) which is so far from the

This is a detached 2-1/2 story "L" shaped structure having thick walls of native blue fieldstone and being approximately two bays wide and fourteen bays in depth with the base of the "L" extending about five bays. A plain balcony of the period projects along the inner facades. The foundation rises to a height of three feet forming a watertable. The many doors are of board and batten construction with pegged beam framing. The building is lighted by many picturesque small 6/6 windows also framed by pegged beams, flat stone arches, and with thick wooden sills. Rear windows are protected by board and batten shutters. A fieldstone pavement leads to the entrances.

The building is capped by steep sloped "A" frame slate roofs overhanging the balconies. Four large square chimneys rise from the ridges.

This structure sets amid lawns, brick paths, flower beds, evergreens and trees.
