

Harry Robinson House
HA 1910

This two story frame house is located on the east side of Main Street in the village of Cardiff, Maryland. Built around the turn of the century, this house is of a unique design and plan within the town of Cardiff. Like the majority of structures in the town, it is of late Victorian, neo-classical design with numerous windows throughout. What is unusual with this house however is that it is a wide, gable roofed structure with a two story bay window capped by a projecting cross gable centered on the main facade and two front entrances at the outer bays. Like most of the structures in this slate quarrying region, the foundation is of coursed slate and the roof is covered with hand-dressed slate shingles.

The house is best known for Harry Robinson, who with his brother, owned and operated the Robinson Feed Mill which was located just over the Pennsylvania line in Delta. It was, however, most likely built for Ellen Williams, daughter of Thomas J. Williams, in the 1890's and was a statement of considerable wealth within the context of Cardiff.

Prepare both a summary paragraph and a general description of the resource and its various elements as it exists today.

This two story frame house is located on the east side of Main Street in the village of Cardiff, Maryland. The house is three bays wide, with the middle bay having a two story three paneled bay window and the outer bays each having an entrance; a projecting cross gable with returns caps the two story central bay. This two entrance/ middle projecting bay window is an unusual configuration and the only one like it in town. A shallow ell projects from the north end of the rear elevation and a deep shed roof porch runs the length of the first story of the main, west facade. Like the majority of houses in and unique to this slate quarrying region, the house has a coursed slate foundation and is roofed in hand-dressed slate shingles. A substantial external, and somewhat ornamental, chimney is located at the north gable end, forward of the peak.

The wide expanse of the main facade is liberally endowed with windows, to include six windows in the two story projecting bay, two double windows in the upper story outer bays, and a single window at the projecting cross gable peak. At the lower story outer bays, the more elaborate main entrance is located at the south end and has transom, sidelights, and multi-pane door whereas the north entrance is simpler, with transom only. The porch has been modified with a brick balustrade and thick brick supports at either end. Winged animal figures are on either side of the centered steps leading to the porch.

Both right and left gable endwalls and rear side have numerous windows as well. The right gable end is four bays wide with small, square or diamond windows at three bays -- two forward lower, one upper -- of the stairwell. The remaining two lower and three upper bays are 1/1 sash. One 2/2 sash is located at the gable peak. An external chimney with sloped set-offs breaks the plane of the left gable end, with small multi-pane windows on either side of it at the first story and a 1/1 sash and small rectangular pane at the second. Additionally, another 1/1 and rectangular pane is in the rear lower and upper bay, respectively, and a 1/1 is at the gable. The rear wall has a secondary entrance with windows in all other bays. A one story shed roof porch projects from the service ell rear wall, with double windows in the upper story.

According to Bob Macomber¹ whose parents owned this house, the house is divided lengthwise, with a long living room and hall with stair in the front part of the first floor and kitchen, dining, and added bath to the rear. Stairs turn ninety degrees to the left midway and lead to an upstairs hall dividing the house transversely. Three bedrooms span the front part of the second floor. A fourth bedroom and the bath are located to the rear.

Prepare both a summary paragraph of significance and a general statement of history and support.

Built around the turn of the century, this house is of a unique design and plan within the town of Cardiff. Like the majority of structures in the town, it is of late Victorian, neo-classical design with numerous windows throughout. What is unusual with this house however is that it is a wide, gable roofed structure with a two story bay window capped by a projecting cross gable centered on the main facade and two front entrances at the outer bays. The first floor is of a three room and hall plan; hall and living room span the front of the house, with kitchen and dining in the rear. The second story has five rooms; three bedrooms across the front and a fourth room and bath to the rear. A long hall transversally divides the house. Like most of the structures in this slate quarrying region, the foundation is of coursed slate and the roof is covered with hand-dressed slate shingles.

Little was uncovered about the history of the structure. The house is best known for Harry Robinson, who with his brother, owned and operated the Robinson Feed Mill which was located just over the Pennsylvania line in Delta. It was, however, most likely built for Ellen Williams, daughter of Thomas J. Williams, in the 1890's and was a statement of considerable wealth within the context of Cardiff. Having immigrated in 1854², Thomas Williams lived in the adjacent house to the north (HA 1909), and was undoubtedly a Welsh slater.

The village of Cardiff developed on the patented land tract of Thomas Hawkins called "Hawkins Chance". The 74 acre parcel was divided and sold by the Hawkins family to Welsh immigrants in the mid-eighteen hundreds for the purpose of slate quarrying. The town developed along Main Street in a linear pattern during the late nineteenth century "boom era".
