STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

From the time when there was a ferry crossing at what is now Lapidum there had been enough commerce in the area to warrant the need for warehouses. In 1772, Jacob Giles, who owned Perkins' old mill on Herring Run and the original Rock Run Mill built a large stone warehouse north of the stream for the use of these mills as well as for the Cumberland Forge. John Stump purchased the building in 1794 for the storage of grain, lumber and iron from his concerns at Stafford and Rock Run. The hills nearby this site came to be known as "Pig Iron Landing" because of the involvement with local forges and furnaces. In 1813, a contingent of British troops from Admiral Cockburn's forces, fresh from the firing of Havre de Grace, visited the ferry landing and burned both the warehouse and a river vessel also belonging to Stump. Local residents persuaded the intruders from doing the same to Robert Bell's tavern and ferryhouse. After the death of John Stump, the property fell into the hands of Ann Archer, daughter of John Stump who owned the land when the settlement was re-christened as Lapidum in 1837 and laid out in 1858. The second warehouse was built in 1858 and it appears on the plat of Lapidum of that year. It was constructed by B. H. Heath and E. J. Rinehart and was located opposite the tidewater canal and Sappington's quarry wharf. Heath and Rinehart leased the property from Ann Archer and dealt in the lumber and fertilizer trade, utilizing the river and the canal for transportation. The warehouse continued to be used throughout the remainder of the century by local merchants; Davis and Pugh in the 1860's and Barnes and Archer in the 1880's. After this time, Lapidum began to decline as a commercial area and the warehouse was no more by the 1890's.
