Bull-Barrow House
Harford County
Kalmia vicinity

UPDATE: The house has no roof and the interior is undoubtedly greatly deteriorated. Access to the house is difficult, through a very muddy cow pasture. The building was not re-surveyed, but was clearly seen from the Archer-Hawkins House (HA-51) nearby.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

This property has neither been lived in nor maintained for at least forty years and has already begun to go through it's death throes. Gaping holes are in the roof, water damage is abundant and a general rot has long since set in.

The dwelling faces towards the west and is composed of three sections. The northernmost one is of original squared and chinked logs and is one bay by one. The logs are covered over on the exterior by bevelled frame. The southern unit is also of bevelled frame and measures three bays by two. These sections are connected by a short stone "breezeway", one bay across. The windows on the breezeway have wooden lintels, and a pair of 2 X 2 attic windows adorn the gable extremes of the house, whose parts are under the same contiguous roof. The two original free-standing sections have finished attics. A low stone foundation is found underneath the southern portion of the building. The windows are all 1 X 1 and are not indigenous to the original house. Opposite doors are stationed on the eastern and western sides of the southern half of the house, and a single entryway is sited on the eastern facade of the log unit. A three-light transom is above the western door of the southern section, and a small cellar bay is positioned on the same unit's southern wall. A single shed dormer faces east and is over the southern part of the house. The roof itself is gable-flank; wood shingles on the southern part and asphalt on the northern wing. A four-bay shed-roof enclosure covers the main entrance on the western side. Two older brick flues are located on the inside ends of the northern and southern extremes. A third, more recent, near the northern end of the principal section of the dwelling.

The Interior

The log section has exposed beams and log walls on the inside, with a large stone and brick fireplace along the northern wall. This hearth is flanked by a closet on the left and a circular stairway on the right. The ceiling is low. The adjacent breezeway has stout stone walls and inset windows. One room in it once served as a pantry. The most detailed area is in the southern section, where the northernmost rooms have single-tier wainscotting. All of these rooms retain the old plaster and high ceilings. Adjacent to the first room is another, with chair rails and two closets beneath the stairway that leads from the thru-hall to the attic. On the other side of the hall is the most ornate room, with ceiling cornices, shoe molding and chair rails. A fireplace is situated along the southern wall and is flanked and topped by two-tier panelling. A closet is to the left and a circular stairway is to the right.

Beyond the house, to the north, are two small barns, constructed of vertical sheathing with gable-front, wood-shingled roofs. One of these has a log frame, joined by mortised joints.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

This house is unique in the fact that it is almost 200 years old and has not been altered very much at all. The penalty for this, however, is the fact that it has not been lived in or maintained for at least forty years. The presence of the house is mentioned as early as 1782, when John Bull willed it to William Bull. The 1783 Tax List shows Francis Bull as owning 130 acres of Ruff's Chance and 21 acres of Howards Harbour. The 1798 Tax List states that William Bull owned a 33 X 18 house with a kitchen, cornhouse, meathouse and stable. The house remained in the Bull family until 1908, spanning three centuries. The 1878 Martenet Map lists the owner as being a "Miss Bull", presumably one of the daughters of William Bull who received the land in 1848.
