DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

This home has been so extremely altered throughout the past few years that very little of the original features remain. The structure consists of a center square section, that was originally log, with a farmhouse built around it, forming an "L". It is a westward-facing, two-story building located on a terraced hillside. A very recent one by one bay addition has been added to the ~~northeast~~ corner and an enclosed porch has filled the gap made by the "L". The walls are aluminum siding over frame, with a low stone base. The main part of the house, less the recent addition, is four bays by two, with randomly positioned 6 X 6 and 2 X 2 windows. These in the center section, the oldest part, are much narrower. Two small windows are located on the southeast corner, where the kitchen is, and there is an attic window on the ~~southern~~ extreme of the house. Two entrances are sited on the western side, one under the porch shelter and the other close to the right-hand corner. There are also two doors on the opposite side, one entering the center section and the other the far eastern part. The doors and windows have been replaced. The porch on the opposite side of the house as the enclosed one is a three bay one on stone piers, with a shed roof. The new roof is gable-flank with asphalt shingles, and the eaves are also new. The brick chimneys are original, with one stationed on the interior ridgeline near the southern end and the other on the inside of the northern extreme.

The interior of the home has also been extensively altered, with most of the original feature removed. The oldest part of the house does retain the low ceiling on the first floor, as well as the one original fireplace opening. In the cellar underneath are pegged beams.

Just southeast of the home is a stone smokehouse, which has a northern-facing door and gable roof. The tin roof and the attic frame are new. Further down the slope is an icehouse of the same stone with the same roof alterations.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The original part of this house probably dates from the late 1700's and the farm that it occupied was called "Fourteen Shillings", after the ground rent that was paid on the place. It was originally part of Samuel Thomas' estate, who owned 400 acres of "Friendship" and 130 acres of "Tripple Union", the tracts on which the house is located. It most likely served as a tenant house of some sort until it passed into the hands of the Cooley family in 1836. The Cooleys refurbished the structure into a large farmhouse that was occupied by Charles Cooley until 1868. It was one of four Cooley houses in the vicinity and the same family operated the nearby gristmill. (The Martenet map shows the 1878 owner to be Charles Cooley, although John Riley was the real owner at the time.)
