

MORGNEC ELEMENTARY SCHOOL
Morgnec, Maryland

K-445

This structure which is now used as a house was the first and only school for the village of Morgnec. It was originally situated on the northern portion of Joshua Chapel Churchyard and was moved to its present location in the late 1930's. Although the structure has no architectural significance, it is important because it is one of the few Black school buildings remaining in the county and because it was once a vital part of its community.

Public sponsorship of schools for Black children began in 1872. According to a local resident and former student at Morgnec, this school was constructed between 1907 and 1912, and operated until the early 1930's. It housed grades one through seven. School children in the eighth grade and high school boarded in Chestertown and attended segregated schools there. After 1934, school buses were provided to carry all children from Morgnec into Chestertown and the abandoned schoolhouse was relocated and converted into a residence.

The old Morgnec School is a small frame building which has been moved to its present location. The building has a gable roof, & the entry is in the south gable. On either side of the door and above it is a six over six sash window. The roof is finished with a simple verge board at the gables and with a plain box cornice at the eaves. On the east facade is a small shed roof porch and on the west is a low, one-story gable roofed kitchen.

The building has a green asphalt roof, grey asphalt siding and green trim. It sits isolated from the small community of Morgnec in the midst of a very well tended yard. The school originally had one room.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

This structure which is now used as a house was the first and only "Col'd" school for the village of Morgnec. It was originally situated on the northern portion of Joshua Chapel Churchyard and was moved to its present location in the late 1930's. Although the structure has no architectural significance, it is important because it is one of the few Black school buildings remaining in the county and because it was once a vital part of its community.

Public sponsorship of schools for Black children began in 1872. Even after that time Black education was far from equal to that for whites. Schools were open fewer hours each day, for fewer month per year, and the teachers were paid far less. Even supplies like books and firewood were given more freely to white schools than to Blacks.*

The inequities of these two systems are apparent even today by comparing this building to the white Kennedyville School (K-391.)

According to a local resident and former student at Morgnec, the school was constructed between 1907 and 1912, and operated until the early 1930's. It housed grades one through seven. School children in the eighth grade and high school boarded in

* The practices in Montgomery County, Maryland, similiar to those in Kent, have been well documented in Black Historical Resources in Montgomery County, Maryland by George W. McDaniel (1979.)
