18th Century

Clark's Conveniency is a three part brick building with central block: three bays wide, one and one-half stories high, and side wings. The entire house is one and one-half stories tall. The main house was probably constructed in the second quarter of the 18th century; the west wing soon after, and the last wing in 1958.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

On the north side of Quaker Neck Road, approximately two miles south of Pomona, Kent County, Maryland, is Clark's Conveniency. This one and one half story, early eighteenth century brick house is built in three sections, the main block and a wing on the east and west ends. Facing south, the center section is three bays wide with the entrance in the center bay. The six-panel door, a reproduction of the original, has a plain wood frame and four-light transom which is pegged. Above the transom is a wood lintel and key. The brick steps to the entrance have beveled edges. On each side of the door is a nine-over-nine light window, also with its original pegged frame. A lintel and key identical to that above the door surmounts each window.

The brick, painted white, is laid in Flemish bond. The house has a molded brick water table and a simple box cornice. On the gable roof, covered with wood shingles, are three "A"-roofed dormers, one above each opening. At each end is a large, interior end chimney of brick with pilasters.

The window and door arrangement on the north side of the main block is identical to that on the south. Below the two windows are small rectangular cellar windows above which are brick segmental arches. The molded brick water table rises above these windows. At the present time a screened porch extends across the north side. There is a shed-roofed dormer with four-over-four sash above each first story window.

The west wing, probably added later to the main house, is two bays wide. It has a door in the east bay with a recessed, three-light transom that may originally have been a window later converted to a door. A nine-over-six light window with its original pegged frame is in the west bay. Between the door and window an opening that may have been the original door has been bricked in. There are two shed-roofed dormer windows with two-over-two lights, one above each opening.

The west end is one room deep and has a large, pilastered, inside end chimney rising through the ridge. Near the south corner is a batten door retaining its original strap hinges and pegged frame.

On the north side of the west wing is a center door constructed of beaded vertical boards. Flanking it are nine-over-six light windows with original frames. Above the windows are shed dormers with six-over-six sash which were added in about 1958 to provide cross-ventilation to the upper floor.

The east wing was added around 1958 and blends very well with the older sections. It is also brick laid in Flemish bond and painted white. The south facade is two bays wide with a nine-over-six sash window in each above which are shed-roofed dormers with six-over-six sash. The eye windows in the east end of the wing are those that were originally in the east end of the main section.

The main house has two rooms. The west room has full paneling surrounding the fireplace on the west wall and wainscoting on the other walls. The slightly recessed chimney breast is flanked by the doorway into the west wing and a closet. The fireplace itself has been reduced in size but the paneling is original. Above the fireplace opening, the paneling is cut to form an arch. In the spandrels are triangular panels. Above the simple mantelpiece are six rectangular panels. At the far left of this wall five steps lead to an enclosed winding stairway. A heavy wood cornice surrounds the room. Molded architraves trim the windows and doors. The window jambs and soffit are paneled. This room also retains its original floor.

The fireplace wall of the east room is identical to that of the west room except for the mantel trim. The fireplace opening, which also appears to have been decreased in size, is framed by a double-crossetted architrave. The closed string stairway at the far left of this wall has square balusters and a turned newel with a ball finial. The room has a heavy cornice and paneled wainscot but no paneling on the window jambs. On both the north and south walls next to the center partition are the exterior doors.

The second floor is divided into three rooms with beaded vertical board partitions and walls. The easternmost room has a fireplace and paneled wall. The paneling and fireplace in the west end were removed when a door was put through into the west wing. They were saved and placed in the east end of the east wing when it was constructed in 1958.

The old kitchen, in the west wing, has a huge brick fireplace on the west wall. Left of the fireplace is a batten door with its original iron strap hinges. The doorway into the hall is very low and the door is constructed of wide vertical boards and has a wood handle. The beams are exposed in the ceiling of the kitchen and also in the hall between the kitchen and the main house. The north end of this hall, originally a shelved pantry, contains a modern kitchen which was installed in 1948-1949.

Several yards northwest of the kitchen is a log smokehouse with dovetailed corners. It has a gable roof covered with wood shingles and is in very poor condition. A Quaker graveyard with its unmarked head and foot stones lies between the smokehouse and the creek beyond.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Clark's Conveniency in Quaker Neck, Kent County, is representative of the houses built by the smaller but still prosperous planters of eighteenth-century tidewater Maryland.¹ Seeming small by today's standards, its two-room, 1 1/2-story main block with a kitchen wing including a hall, was actually a good-sized house, as the majority of planters' houses in the first three decades of the eighteenth century were one-room, 1 1/2-story structures.²

The house is a well-preserved one retaining much of its original woodwork and hardware. The twentieth century changes that have been made are in keeping with the period of the house and the work done was carefully copied from original examples extant in the structure. (see description).

The sloping set-backs of the chimneys on the main block are seen in several other buildings in Quaker Neck, specifically "The Reward."

The tract called Clark's Conveniency was patented for 196 acres as "Clarks Conveyance" in 1707 by Dennis Clark. There was no house on the land in that year. In 1732 the land was resurveyed by a William Clark, probably the son of Dennis, when it contained 154 acres. Clark sold half of this to Joseph Mason two years later for 3000 pounds of "merchantable tobacco." Then in 1745, Clark was granted a second resurvey on the tract, this time for 362 acres.³

¹Aubrey C. Land, "The Planters of Colonial Maryland," Maryland Historical Magazine, LXVII (Spring, 1972), 116. Land divides the planter of colonial Maryland into three groups: (1) those with less than £100 in personalty, or paupers, (2) those worth in excess of £1000, or the very wealthy, and (3) those inbetween, who ranged from prosperous to just short of the wealthiest. In the 1730's, which is about when Clark's Conveniency was built, 73% of the Maryland population were paupers, 2% were the wealthy, and the middle group from which the builders of Clark's Conveniency came, constituted 25% of the population.

Also in 1745, John Clark, a carpenter, sold 196 acres (the original acreage) of Clark's Conveniency to William Clark, Sr., planter, and Joseph Mason, carpenter.⁴ At this time, Clark and Mason were both already in possession of half shares of the tract. This deed was therefore probably made to make clear the title, boundaries, and acreage of the land which had become confused in the preceding property transferrals and resurveys.

A house is mentioned on the property in this 1745 deed, indicating that the present building was erected between 1707 and 1745. The construction probably occurred circa 1735 to 1745 as there is no mention of a house in the 1734 deed from Clark to Mason.

In 1749 and 1750, Clark and Mason both sold their half shares of Clark's Conveniency to Thomas Wilkins, a shipwright. In the Debt Books for Kent County, this land is owned by Wilkins in 1760, but by 1769, it is in the possession of Bartus Wilkins, probably his son. In 1769, Bartus petitioned the proprietary to examine witnesses in an attempt to make clear the boundaries of Clark's Conveniency which had "become obsolete." No final decision was recorded, although the testimony of several men was taken down.⁵

Bartus Wilkins died in 1800 and left Clark's Conveniency to his son Bartus. The latter died eight years later, leaving the land to his brothers Thomas and Edward. Thomas died in 1842 and his children sold the property out of the family in 1878.⁶

The tract Clark's Conveniency was patented by a small planter and the house is typical of a prosperous planter's home. During the next several decades, however, it was owned by a succession of carpenters and shipwrights. This was probably due to the convenient location of the property six miles down the Chester River from Chestertown, the major eighteenth-century port on Maryland's Eastern Shore. By mid-century, the shipwright's trade in the Colonies was a substantial one, centered largely around the seaport towns, such as Chestertown.⁷ The shipbuilding industry went through alternating periods of boom and depression, and as in other businesses at this time, a man had to engage in more than one occupation to become truly prosperous.⁸

Thomas Wilkins, the owner of Clark's Conveniency from 1749 until the 1760's, was a shipwright and a planter. When he died in 1778, his inventory records that in addition to tar, turpentine, cypress shingles, oak shingles, and oak plank, he had four ploughs, two corn harrows, five broad hoes, two grubbing hoes, four pitchforks, two dung forks, and other farming implements.⁹ He was apparently successful economically as the total value of his estate came to over £1600. His prosperity is also reflected in the fact that he owned rather than leased his house. This was an indication of his success as only the more prosperous craftsmen were able to afford this.¹⁰

Clark's Conveniency is a well-preserved and cared for example of an eighteenth-century planter's home made unusual historically by its known association with the shipwright and carpenter trades.

Clark's Conveniency
Quaker Neck
c.1750

In 1707, a 196 acre tract of land on Quaker Neck was granted to a planter named Dennis Clark.¹ It is located at the headwaters of Philip Creek and was first known as Clark's Convenience. Over the years the name has changed to Clark's Conveniency. The 1-1/2 story brick house which exists on the property today is most likely the work of Thomas Wilkins who purchased the tract in 1749-50.²

Wilkins was both a shipwright and planter and lived on the tract until his death in 1769. At that time his property was appraised at @1600, an enormous fortune in a period when a person worth @1000 would have been considered wealthy.

The house in which Thomas Wilkins lived is an extraordinary example of vernacular architecture. It contains many masonry features used in larger houses of the County such as the Reward, Violet Farm and Comegy's Bight. Those include a molded water table which jogs up and over the basement windows and sloped weatherings on the chimneys and withes, those pilaster-like protrusions which divide the stack in two. The facade was laid in Flemish bond and the arches over the 9/9 sash windows are segmental. The principal facade arches of the central door and two flanking windows are rusticated wooden jack arches with keystones and do not date from the original construction. The fenestration of the kitchen wing has also undergone change. Originally there was a central door with flanking windows on its principal facade.

Clark's Conveniency was built as a hall-parlor plan and was very well finished. Both hall and parlor had fully paneled fireplace walls. The paneling in each case was recessed from the face of the adjoining closets and stair by about 6 inches (similar to the treatment at Dullam's Folly in the upper part of the County). Paneled wainscoting was installed in the hall and all four first floor windows had paneled jambs with trim that tied into the cornice, like those at the Custom House.

The overmantel panel arrangement was the same in both rooms, but the hall fireplace opening was rectangular and trimmed with crossetted trim, whereas the parlor fireplace opening was arched with small triangular panels within the rectangular panels. The former was like that found at neighboring Providence (1781) and the latter more like that at Violet Farm (1762) and Rose Hill (c.1760). In both rooms the stairs are partially enclosed having five steps within the room before running behind the paneling. In both instances there is a handsome balustrade with turned columnar newels with ball finials.

On the second floor there are three small chambers, two with fireplaces and paneling. The middle chamber being divided from the others by vertical boards.

The kitchen wing was at ground level and probably had a brick floor when built. Its plan consisted of a passage, pantry and kitchen, all divided by board walls. In the kitchen there was a very large fireplace with iron crane. On the north side of the building there was a dove-tailed plank smokehouse which has disappeared along with other original outbuildings.
