Henry T. Onley Log House (site)
Big Woods Community
Private

c. 1783

This one and a half story log house was built as the home of the Black landowner, Henry T. Onley, with the assistance of his neighbors several years after emancipation. Like most other houses built by the first generation freedmen, it contained two rooms down and two up. In the 20th century the house was occupied by Onley's granddaughter, Florence Hallman, who remembers much of its history and that of the Big Woods community.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Florence Hallman recalls that this house was built by her paternal grandfather, Henry Thomas Onley. It was pulled down several years ago, and the logs pushed down into a deep hole dug for the purpose and covered over. Little remains of the site today. Florence Hallman does however have two pictures of the house during her occupancy. These have been copied as part of this survey.

From the photograph and Mrs. Hallman's recollection, the following description has been obtained. The house stood on the slope of a hill and faced the west, towards Big Woods Road. The house stood one and a half stories in height. Its facade consisted of three bays, a front door centrally located flanked by two windows on either side. The windows contained double hung sashes with 6 x 6 panes. There was no covered front porch, but there was a raised platform in front of the house.

The house contained two rooms down and two up. The downstairs was heated by a wood stove; a large wood stove was used in the kitchen Mrs. Hallman recalls. The interior and exterior of the house were whitewashed.

In the 20th century, the exposed logs on the outside of the wall were covered with asphalt sheathing for insulation. As the house began to deteriorate, Mrs. Hallman moved a small trailer to the site and now lives in it. Eventually, the old log house had to be pushed down, she recalls, because the foundation had given way, and there were other structural problems. But after the house was pulled down, many of the upper logs were just as sound as the day they were hewn out, Mrs. Hallman says.

For her description of how her grandfather and others in the community built and maintained these houses, see the inventory forms of the log houses of Louis Brown and Fred Hamilton in the Big Woods community. Mrs. Hallman points out that all the log houses were pretty much the same, so these houses are described in more detail since they are available for investigation.

The outbuildings around the Henry T. Onley house were the usual ones around the farm houses: a hen house (where ducks were also raised too); a privy; a stable for horses; a meat house; and hog pens. Her grandfather had planted many fruit trees on the property, which provided the family each fall with a bountiful harvest. They included sweet apple and peach trees. The fruit was canned and put up for the winter. There was also a large vegetable garden. The entire homestead -- with the hen house, hog pen, meat house, garden, and fruit trees -- was a representative example of a rural Black homestead in the Big Woods community and elsewhere in Montgomery County, homesteads where the families raised much of their own food for themselves and depended on themselves and the help of their community for the significant basics of their livelihood.

BUILDER/ARCHITECT

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Henry Onley purchased this tract of 5.92 acres in 1873 from the trustees of the Hempstone estate according to deed EBP 10/859. This establishes him as among the earliest of the Black settlers in Big Woods after emancipation.

This house was most likely built soon after the purchase of the land by Henry Onley in 1873. Florence Hallman recalls that it was built by her grandfather with the help of the community. It was among the first of the log houses to have been built in the postbellum Black community in Big Woods.

Though the house is not standing, the recollection of it is important because it allows us to see the progression in housing in this community and in others in Montgomery County. It is similar in plan and design to the log houses in the Martinsburg and Sugarland communities. See the photographs of it that have been copied that were in the possession of Florence Hallman and see the photographs of the log houses in Big Woods -- the Fred Hamilton, Lewis Brown, and Jess Diggins houses -- that are still standing. According to Florence Hallman, all log houses in Big Woods were more or less alike, so those houses still standing convey the general appearance of the log house of Henry T. Onley.

Florence Hallman recalls that her grandfather said that he paid twenty dollars an acre for this tract, making a total of $120 for the six acres. This figure could be compared with other land prices in the area to determine if this was a low, average, or expensive price for such land. In addition, it would be important to know Onley's income as a farmer and farm laborer to determine the proportion of his income that the cost of his home accounted for.

Florence Hallman has been a remarkable informant. Her mind is clear, and she recalls with considerable accuracy the houses and life styles of families in her community in the early 1900s.

NOTE: According to Mrs. Hallman, her grandfather "was a boy during slavery". His wife's name was Flora, and she was named after her.
