Lewis Garnett House (Site)
Sugarland Community
Private

c. 1884

This two story frame house was the home of a Black landowning family, and its floor plan of two rooms down and two up was typical of the homes of rural Black families of moderate means in the late 1800s.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Tilghman Lee recalls that this was a two story frame house with two rooms down and two up. It stood near the west corner of the Sugarland community on the northwest side of Sugarland Lane. The front of the house was oriented toward the east, and the gable of the house was oriented toward the east, and the gable end toward Sugarland Lane (south). The facade contained a door flanked by a window on each side with double hung sashes with 6 x 6 panes.

Lees description of the heating in this house and in others gives us glimpses into the methods of keeping warm in these old-time houses. A stove flue ascended through the middle of this house with pipes let into it from either room downstairs. The pipes served the wood stoves which warmed each room. A tin collar surrounded the pipe at its junction with the chimney. In the upstairs there were no stoves; in fact, the only house in the community with stoves upstairs was the Patrick Hebron house. The reason for this absence was that the old people did not trust stoves because of the fire hazard. Nonetheless, the upstairs was warmed somewhat by the heat rising from below, Lee recalls. But to keep warm at night the family members principally covered the bed with piles of quilts that they had made. Instead of pajamas, Lee recalls that they slept in their "Union Suits".

In regard to other clothing for cold weather, Lee says that the old-time men dressed in two or three pairs of trousers, if they were working outside.

During the winter they engaged in such activities as hauling ice or cutting wood for the farms. Lee recalls that each family consumed about ten cords per winter and that in order to acquire this much wood, the families helped one another in the community. They got the wood from forests owned by nearby white farmers, who gave them the wood in return for cutting and hauling wood for their families. This was one way, among many, in which cash was not needed in a traditional society. Instead, families exchanged each others materials and/or services.

Another reciprocal arrangement was cutting and hauling ice. It was sawn from creeks, lakes, the canal, or from special ponds dug for the purpose. The ice was hauled to the farms, deposited in the ice houses where it was bedded in straw, and used in the summer. During the summer, ice was borrowed from these families if one of the family members of Sugarland had the "fever", which could result from a number of illnesses. The ice was used to cool the person, comfort him or her, and if possible bring down the temperature. This was before the days of sulfa drugs and antibiotics, when black families had to depend upon themselves and the skills of experienced community people for much of their medical care.

BUILDER/ARCHITECT

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The house itself was fairly representative of the larger homes built by Black landowners in the late 19th century. But more significant was the description of everyday life (given in the Physical Description) that this house elicited from Tilghman Lee. These details are rarely recorded.

The property lines of Lewis Garnett's land have been changed in the 20th century so it is difficult to delineate them exactly. On the county property map, his land consisted of CR53-P.327 and a portion of P.190. But investigation of early deeds do show that Garnett acquired about 14 acres in three separate purchases. In 1884 he purchased two parcels from Augustus P. Webb and Annie Webb (JA 15/500), and another one from Frederick Dawson and Thomas Darby, (administrators for George W. Dawson, deceased), (JA 15/502). In 1885 he purchased another parcel from the Webb family (JA 15/498). In 1926 these were sold for tax purposes (402/63).

The U.S. Census for 1880 lists Lewis Garnett (born 1840) with wife Frances (born 1842) and with two children Henry (born 1873) and Rebecca (born 1875). All were born in Maryland. Garnett's occupation was given as "works on farm" and his wife was a housekeeper. Tilghman Lee recalls two more children born later - - Florence and Lewis, Jr. He confirms the census report.
