DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

This small one story frame house faces east, towards Sugarland Lane. In front of it is a well-kept lawn with flowers. To the south of the house is a large vegetable garden, and outbuildings such as a hen house, storage sheds, and a small building once used as a meat house. These buildings are frame, have weathered appearance, are still in use, and are well maintained.

The facade contains three bays, a door centrally located flanked by two windows. The front rooms of the house are the sitting room and the earlier kitchen (now the dining room) with its old wood stove. Behind (west of) the sitting room is a small bedroom, and behind the dining room is the present-day kitchen. Behind the small bedroom is another bedroom, and behind the kitchen is a bathroom, recently added.

In the first kitchen is a boxed stairway leading up to the chambers above.

The house is frame. The materials were surplus from a nearby saw mill and were gathered by Tilghman Lee. He put up the house in the 1930's. The frame was first covered with weatherboards and has now been covered with tar paper siding, known as "bricktex". The most decorative structural feature in the house is the handsome neo-Georgian mantle that Lee salvaged from a nearby white landowner's house that was to be torn down. He installed it by his brick stove flue in the sitting room, where it adds a soft touch of high style.

The principal room in the house however is the old kitchen. It is centered by the wood stove, on which Mrs. Lee cans vegetables. Nearby is a dining table and chairs, which serves too as the informal sitting room for visiting family, relatives, and friends. This is the continuation of the traditional use of the kitchen as the center of the family life. All the rooms are decorated with special family mementoes, religious pictures, and family photographs. The house is very much a home.

Behind the church is a small building, used as a community center. Further west of the church was the home of Nathan Johnson, who was the postmaster for the community. West of his property along Sugarland Road was the small Sugarland School. About 200 yards west of the school was a small store, which sold household supplies and foodstuffs that the families did not grow themselves.

The traditional uses of homestead space are continued by a few present-day inhabitants of the community. The best example is the homestead of Tilghman Lee, seen in Map 12. The map shows that almost all land available was used towards some purpose and includes details such as dog houses, wood piles, work tables, and a truck van now used for storage of farm tools. This map and photograph of Lee's side yard (Figure 37) enriches our picture of early 20th century homesteads.

Community Institutions

By the last quarter of the 19th century, the community had developed its own institutions. In 1871 land was acquired for the church and cemetery, indicating the importance of the church to this community of freed slaves. The date of purchase, which is earlier than the time of acquisition of property by most of the settlers, shows that they were living in
