9. Description: This building is a 2-story brick commercial structure in the Queen Anne style. The distinctive cast-iron storefront is covered with a shed roof, metal-covered canopy extending several feet with simple round iron columns. The sides of the canopy are wood, with simple ornamentation. The building has an ornate stepped facade, capped with ornamental cornice, with semi-ornate brickwork over the front second-floor windows. There is a similar stepped facade on the east. Both stepped facades cover gable ends, and being at right angles create a hip-roof on the northwest corner. The roofing is patterned slate. Along the east facade adjacent to the building is a truck-weighing scale, with wood platform. To the rear of the main building along Church Street is a large board-and-batten covered barn shed, in charming if rugged state of preservation. These have always been commercial structures.

10. Significance: This commercial structure is the last cast-iron front building remaining in Rockville, and is symbolic of the growth of Rockville following the coming of the railroad.

The "Third Addition to Rockville" was subdivided by William Brewer in 1872 in anticipation of the opening of the Metropolitan Branch of the B & O Railroad the following year. This desirable property directly across the street from the railroad depot changed hands several times before William Wallace Welsh purchased it and constructed his frame general store in 1884. Welsh and his partner David H. Warfield sold implements, grains, fuels and provisions.

A fire destroyed the frame building about 1895, and a new brick building was constructed shortly afterward. After Welsh's death during the influenza epidemic at the close of World War I, Porter and Frank Ward operated the store from 1923 to 1964, conveying it to Paul Wire in 1964.

A large frame house adjacent to his building for most of its life housed the owner/proprietor of the store; it was demolished in 1978.

BUILDER/ARCHITECT

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The "Third Addition to Rockville" was subdivided by William Brewer in 1872 in anticipation of the opening of the Metropolitan Branch of the B&O Railroad the following year.

The desirability of a property lying directly across the street from the railroad depot made lot #9 a choice investment. Though this land changed hands several times between 1872 and 1884, it was not until its purchase by William Wallace Welsh in July, 1884 that a commercial establishment was erected there, even though the depot had been open since 1873.¹ Welsh had relocated in Rockville after the Civil War, clerking in John Higgins' store until he opened his own.

Welsh and his partner, David H. Warfield, erected a frame building and sold implements, grains, fuels and provisions. In the summer of 1885, a large warehouse adjoining the store was built.² These buildings were destroyed by a fire about 1895 in which two persons lost their lives after being struck by falling debris and a chimney.³ A new brick building was erected further south on the lot, the present store at 22 Baltimore Road. Its appearance in 1977 is much the same as in 1897, having the original cast iron front and awning supported by columns, and the original wooden counters.

Only three families have owned this property since the construction of the original store. Although Welsh died at the close of World War I, his family did not sell it until 1923.⁴ Porter and Frank Ward owned and operated the store from 1923 to 1964, conveying it to the present owner in 1964.

A large frame house adjacent to this building at #18 Baltimore Road for most of its life housed the owner/proprietor of the store and his family. This dwelling was demolished in 1978.

Although the major commercial development of Rockville flowed several streets away from this store, and the railroad's importance as a means of transportation waned, this store has always remained a viable part of the business establishment and to this day many people go out of their way to purchase their seeds, fertilizer and nails amid its high-ceilinged, quaint interior.
