DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The Old Town Friends' Meeting House typifies the refined simplicity and dignity of the Quaker Meeting House. It is a two-story, brick building which has undergone several alterations over the years. The architect of the 1967 restoration, Francis H. Jencks, has attempted to restore the building as it appears in a photograph taken circa 1845-1850.¹ The exterior fabric of the meeting house is original.

Three of the exterior walls are set in Flemish bond, while the fourth wall, on the east, is of common bond. Apparently the building always had a chimney with stove in the east gable, but the chimney in the west gable was a later addition, added in the early 19th century.² The building at one time apparently had six entrances; two in the north and two in the south walls and one at each end; however, the two doorways in the north side (Fayette Street) were bricked over and remain thus. Some of the window sashes are original, but most are of the mid-19th century, at which time the pediments over the first-floor windows were applied. The outside shutters were changed from the louvered to the solid type during the 1967 restoration. At that time, also, evidence was found that the balcony may have extended along the west end wall, although it is now along only the south wall.

¹The drawings for the 1967 restoration are on file at the offices of Wrenn, Lewis and Jencks, 113 W. Monument Street, Baltimore, Maryland 21201. Measured drawings made by Mr. Addison Worthington in 1956 are in the possession of Mr. Philip Myers, 4208 N. Charles Street, Baltimore, Maryland 21218.

²The earliest known drawing of the building is on the border of the Poppleton Map of Baltimore (1852) to be found at the Peale Museum in Baltimore.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Old Town Friends' Meeting House is one of Baltimore's few remaining 18th-century structures. It is the oldest religious building in the city, having been built in 1781. At that time, the Patapsco Friends' Meeting, then located in Baltimore County, received permission from the Gunpowder Monthly Meeting to move to the eastern side of Jones Falls, at Fayette and Aisquith Streets, and to build a meeting house there. George Mathews was the contractor for the building, which was considered to be "quite on the eastern border" of the city.¹ The cost was $4,500.² The congregation became known as the Baltimore Meeting or the Aisquith Street Meeting, and by 1793, had attained the status of a Montly Meeting.

In 1828 during a stormy session, the Orthodox Friends withdrew from the Baltimore Montly Meeting because of disagreements with the liberal element, which then became known as "Hick-sites." This division is still observed by both groups.

From as early as 1660, the Society of Friends exerted a strong influence socially, politically, and economically in Maryland. A number of influential Baltimore Quakers worshipped at the Aisquith Street Meeting House: Philip E. Thomas, first President of the B & O Railroad; Johns Hopkins; Moses Sheppard, the philanthropist; the Ellicott family, who founded the mill town of Ellicott City, just outside Baltimore; and Isaac and Elisha Tyson, Baltimore merchants and early exponents of the anti-slavery movement.

The building was abandoned in about 1921 and remained unused until 1967, when extensive restoration was undertaken through the efforts of a group of private individuals in cooperation with the city government. It is now (1970) operated by the Peale Museum which has plans for installing exhibits and opening it to the public in the very near future.

The name "Old Town" Friends' Meeting has been applied to the building since the restoration, in recognition of its location in that part of the city of Baltimore which was annexed in 1745 and which now is due for rehabilitation under Urban Renewal.
