DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

St. Luke's Church at 217 North Carey Street is located just above the northeast corner of Franklin Square, Baltimore, Maryland.

St. Luke's is a Gothic Revival Church designed following the dictates of the Ecclesiological Society,¹ who maintained that ecclesiastical architecture follow the example of English medieval building principles. Although not as perfect an "English county parish church" as other Maryland churches of the same period, especially St. Mary's Church, Emmorton, St. Luke's embodies many of the characteristics demanded by the ecclesiologists.

Following Gothic precedents, St. Luke's is comprised of a tall nave, flanked by side aisles below a clerestory. At the southwest corner, there is a crenelated tower with lancet windows. (The present spindly spire does not relate to Gothic Revival architecture). The chancel, properly, is located at the east end of the church and is a distinct unit. The separation is expressed by the smaller size of the chancel in comparison with the nave. St. Luke's has two transepts, although the north one was expanded after the completion of the church and is too large for strict ecclesiological principles. The majority of the windows are lancet-shaped in the fourteenth century English Gothic tradition. Rose windows exist at the west end of the nave and along the clerestory. The clerestory windows have stone quatrefoil tracery.

All the corners are buttressed, as are the aisles.

The interior of St. Luke's embodies the High Church principles of the ecclesiologists. The stations of the cross and the religious statues are two examples. The rood screen located at the entrance to the chancel separates the congregation from the celebration of the sacraments, following ecclesiological demands.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The largest Episcopal church in Baltimore at its completion, St. Luke's is a landmark in the early nineteenth century American Gothic Revival. The extant church is the work of J. W. Priest, an important American architect.¹

St. Luke's Church was completed too late to have been an innovative church in the ante-bellum phase of the Gothic Revival. Its importance lies in the fact that it embodies many of the architectural characteristics of the ecclesiological movement and as the work of J. W. Priest.

Historically, the construction of St. Luke's is of interest because so many architects were involved in it: Robert Cary Long, Jr., John Notman, Frank Wills, the firm of Niernsee and Neilson, and finally, J. W. Priest.

Priest holds a prominent place in architectural history because of his buildings, his architectural writings and his association with the foundation of the American Institute of Architects. Between 1849 and 1850, Priest wrote three articles which refined the ecclesiological approach to architecture for the New York Ecclesiologist, a journal preoccupied with the Gothic style and ecclesiastical architecture. Ecclesiologists both in England and in America held that proper Christian worship could take place only in a Gothic church. New churches, they maintained, should be constructed following as closely as possible medieval precedents. Priest's articles developed this theory. His buildings, along with those of Frank Wills, Richard Upjohn and John Notman, embodied these ideas in stone and wood. These same men influenced the development of American architecture as the founders of the American Institute of Architects (1857).

St. Luke's Parish was founded in 1847. Although St. Luke's Church was not completely finished for twenty years, the vestry began immediately to plan a church. The first architect they contacted was Robert Cary Long, Jr., who had designed two Gothic Revival churches in Baltimore, the Franklin Street Presbyterian Church and St. Alphonsus' Church. drawings, but the vestry could not decide whether or not to accept them. In 1849, they opened negotiations with John Notman of Philadelphia, who, in 1850, designed Emmanuel Church, Cumberland, Maryland. Notman submitted drawings for a church; once more, the vestry could not reach a decision.

In 1851, still without an architect, St. Luke's Parish corresponded with Frank Wills, another Gothic Revival architect. When the negotiations with Wills fell through, the vestry selected the Baltimore firm of Niernsee and Neilson.

On November 1, 1851, the cornerstone was laid. The first services were held in the uncompleted church in November 1853. Soon thereafter structural flaws in the building and an insufficient heating system led the rector, Reverend Charles W. Rankin, to contact J. W. Priest.

Arriving in 1857, Priest found St. Luke's awkwardly designed and structurally inadequate. He corrected the deficiencies, repairing the plastering, the insulation, the floors and the roof. He lengthened the nave which had been badly proportioned. He added the chancel and the chancel aisles, as well as the south porch at the east end of the nave. He also advocated a gallery at the west end. The present appearance of St. Luke's is due to Priest's work on the church.

Intended as a mission church, Robert Cary Long, Jr. submitted plans shortly before his death. In 1849 John Notman submitted plans, followed by specifications in 1850, but a contract was never arrived at. In 1851-53 Niernsee and Nielson of Baltimore built most of the nave and part of the tower. J.W. Priest, an architect recommended by the New York Ecclesiological Society, was hired in 1857 to complete the church and to correct defects in the work of the earlier firm. Priest died in 1858 and the structure was completed by his partner H.M. Congdon. Upon completion St. Luke's was the largest Protestant Episcopal church in Baltimore and was noted for its fine stained glass. The altar window was by Wailes of Newcastle, but the majority of the other windows were designed by William Butterfield and constructed by Gibbs of London. (Data from Phoebe Stanton The Gothic Revival and American Church Architecture, Baltimore: 1968).

Although built by several architects, St. Luke's is a good representation of 'accurate' church architecture as proposed by the ecclesiologists and has the characteristic high, narrow nave with lower side aisles (pointed nave arcade), deep chancel separated from the crossing by a fine rood screen, and a large ~~Perpendicular Style~~ ^{Decorated} east window; ceiling treatment is dark wood beaming, walls are stucco.

Adjoining Rectory on North Carrollton Street is a tall, stone house also in English Gothic (prob c 1902, I think, there is a distone).
