Site of Marlboro "Colored" School
Valley Lane (north side), Upper Marlboro, Md.
Priv/Unocc/ - /Unexposed

The Marlboro "Colored" Elementary School stood on this site from its construction in 1877 until its demolition in 1982. It was a one-story frame gable-roofed structure, with entrance through the south gable end. Four windows on each side lighted the single room which constituted the larger north section of the building.

The history of the Marlboro "Colored" School is closely associated with that of Union Chapel. Members of the church formed the Colored Free School Society in 1866, and with the Freedmen's Bureau overseeing construction, the first schoolhouse was completed and opened in April 1868. It is not certain what happened to this schoolhouse, but it was replaced within ten years; the second schoolhouse was built on the subject property in 1877, and it was this Marlboro "Colored" Elementary School which operated for over a half-century. In 1935, it was sold as a private residence, and it remained so until the summer of 1982. At this time, it was replaced through block grant funding by a prefabricated house, and the school building was razed. It's site, however, is important in the history of Black education in Prince George's County.

Prepare both a summary paragraph and a general description of the resource and its various elements as it exists today.

The Marlboro Colored Elementary School stood on this site from its construction ca. 1877 until it was demolished in the summer of 1982. It was a one-story frame gable-roofed structure, with entrance through the south gable end, typical of the post Civil War schools built for black students. Four windows on each side lighted the single room which constituted the larger north section of the building; a small room on the south (probably added later) formed the entryway, and was lighted by one window on each side.

High School was built (for Black students) just south of the Courthouse in Upper Marlboro. At that time (1935) the high school was removed and the old elementary school was sold by the Board of Education as a private residence; it remained so until the summer of 1982. Because of its deteriorated condition, block grant funding provided for its replacement: a small prefabricated home was built next to the old school, and as soon as it was habitable, the old school was destroyed. Its site, however, is important in the history of Black education in P.G. County.
