The Piscataway House is a one and one half story frame dwelling with a steep, pitched gable roof extending to cover a porch on the east and west facades. The west façade is three bays wide with the main entrance through the central bay. Two freestanding brick chimneys are on each gable end connected by a pent-roofed closet. On the east and west slopes of the roof are three dormer windows with fluted pilasters, small capitals, and broken pediments. The house was moved in the c. 1942 from the Town of Piscataway, approximately 4 miles to the south, to avoid demolition. The once separate brick kitchen was attached to the north façade at that time. In 1980 a south wing was designed and built to balance the carriage house and kitchen on the north. A circular graveled driveway separates a frame workhouse from the house. Farther to the west is a frame stable in a small pasture behind the house.

The Piscataway House, constructed c. 1750, is a good example of mid-eighteenth century domestic architecture. The house exhibits characteristics typical of Tidewater Colonial domestic architecture. roof closets built between the chimneys are specific to Maryland according to Hugh Morrison author of Early American Architecture published by Dover Publications. The central hall and double parlor plan is also typical of houses built in the 18th. The Piscataway House exhibits all of these features and remains in very good condition. Despite being moved and the more modern southern addition the Piscataway House retains the design, materials, workmanship, and feeling of a colonial house. Though once situated within the Town of Piscataway, the current location in the Broad Creek area is an appropriate setting since both were tobacco communities.

The Piscataway house is a good example of 18th Century domestic architecture and is eligible for the National Register of Historic Places under Criterion C. Criterion consideration B states that a house removed from its original location may still be eligible for listing if it is mainly eligible for its architectural value. This property meets that requirement and maintains its eligibility despite having been moved. The house is not eligible under Criteria A and B for any associations with events or people. Criterion D was not assessed for this determination.

HISTORIC SITES SUMMARY SHEET

P.G. County Survey : 80-9 Date ca. 1750

Building Name Piscataway House

Location 10307 Livingston Road, Oxon Hill, Md.

Open to Public yes no

Piscataway House is a one-and-one-half story frame house, with a steep two-pitched gable roof extending to cover a porch on each facade. The main west facade is three bays wide, with entrance through the central bay. There are two massive free-standing brick chimneys on each gable end; those on the south end are connected by a pent. On each of the east and west slopes of the roof are three dormers which have unusual decorative detail: fluted pilasters, small capitals and broken pediments.

The house was dismantled and moved by Charles Collins circa 1942 from its location in the village of Piscataway, and meticulously rebuilt on this location, part of Collins' Harmony Hall acreage. A separate brick kitchen dependency was moved and rebuilt at the same time, and attached to the north gable end of the house.

The interior is a central hallway with double parlor on each side. The architraves of the doors and windows on the first story have bulls-eye corner blocks, while those on the second story have plain cyma reversa moldings.

Piscataway house is a rare surviving representative of mid-18th century domestic architecture. It formerly stood on a lot immediately west of the Hardy Tavern on the south side of the main road through Piscataway. Although the name of the builder is undetermined, the house and lot came into the possession in 1779 of Thomas Clagett, store and inn keeper at an establishment across the road. In 1798, the house (without dormers) was owned and occupied by Clagett's daughter, Mary McElderry. It was subsequently the home of Dr. Josias A. Beall and John B. Edelen. The Ward family acquired the house and lot in 1868, and held it until 1932; it was during their residence that the 19th century interior renovations were made on the first story.

The house now commands a spectacular view of Broad Creek in a still rural setting between historic Harmony Hall and St. John's Church at Broad Creek. The owner has just (1980) completed a south wing carefully designed to balance the Collins-built carriage house on the north.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Piscataway House is representative of pre-Georgian 18th century , domestic architecture in southern and eastern Maryland. Two massive chimneys at each gable end, a steep, two-pitched roof with three dormers, front and rear porches under continuous roof line, and a chimney pent are the outstanding features. A center doorway with four-light transom is flanked by nine-over-six sash windows. The dormers, with fluted pilasters, small capitals, and broken pediments formed of thin mouldings, light the loft on the front and rear facades, while a window between the chimney stacks lights the south gable end. On the ground floor there are four-over-four windows on either side of the chimney base. The front porch is supported by square columns on brick pedestals, the rear porch by round columns set on the brick paving.

A brick wing in Flemish Bond was added to the north side of the house as a kitchen. It has four-over-four windows with flat brick relieving arches; the keystones of the arches are shaved, trapezoidal bricks.
