Description

The Cox House is on a hillside 300 feet west of Croom Road. It is a local landmark because of its siting. It is a two-story frame structure of three-by-two-bays, with a "T" shaped plan, and a center front cross gable. The three-bay east (main) facade has central entrance through a modern door flanked by plain pilasters surmounted by corner blocks. There are five-light sidelights. The door surround appears to be original fabric. Windows throughout the structure are 2/2 double hung sash, with modern shutters. A hipped roof entrance porch rests on turned and chamfered wood posts. The porch is wood floored, reached by a three-step stair. Above the entrance at attic level is a cross gable with a louvered lunette opening. The house is covered with vinyl siding resembling German siding. The gable roof is corrugated metal, the foundation is poured cement. The north and south gable ends have an interior corbelled brick chimney at the gable ridge. Centered on the west (rear) facade is a one-by-one-bay two-story frame kitchen wing, the same roofline, siding and foundation as the main block. There is a concrete block interior chimney at its west gable ridge. A gable roof one-story, one-bay portico on the northwest corner of the wing contains entrance to a small basement. The interior has a center-hall-two-parlor plan. The kitchen opens at the rear of the hall. The door and window surrounds are wide molding with bull's-eye corner blocks. There are crown molded base boards. The kitchen has narrow vertical boards as wainscot. The enclosed stair has ceiling pendants at the corners of the stair well.

Significance

The Brooks-Cox House is on what was a 300 acre farm, composed of tracts called Pitchcraft and Simm's Delight. Pitchcraft is old, patented in 1672 by Edward Fitzherbert. It was owned during the 19th century by the Dr. Richard H. Osbourn family and by Elizabeth E. Hardy. Thomas B. Hardy acquired 208 acres of the property in 1896. The property was sold to James E. Brooks in 1922. Brooks, a black farmer, probably built the house in 1923. The house is significant for its late 19th century Victorian vernacular style. It is a late example of the center front cross gable "I" house with Victorian entrance porch, popular in the County in the late 19th and early 20th centuries.

Acreage: 2.53 acres.

Prepare both a summary paragraph and a general description of the resource and its various elements as it exists today.

The Brooks-Cox House is situated on a hillside approximately 300 feet west of Croom Road. It is highly visible to those traveling south on Croom Road and is a local landmark because of its siting. The house is a two-story frame structure of three-by-two-bays, with a "T" shaped plan, and a center front cross gable.

The three-bay east (main) facade has central entrance through a modern door flanked by plain pilasters surmounted by corner blocks. There are five-light sidelights. The door surround appears to be original fabric. Windows throughout the structure are 2/2 double hung sash, with modern plastic louvered shutters. A three-bay hipped roof entrance porch shelters the first story. The roof rests on turned and chamfered wood posts. The balustrade has plain rectangular balusters. The porch is wood floored, reached by a three-step stair. The base of the porch is screened by a screen of vertical wood slats. Centered above the entrance at attic level is across gable with a louvered lunette opening.

The house is covered with plastic siding resembling German siding. The house originally was covered with German siding. The gable roof is covered with a corrugated metal covering. The foundation is poured cement. The two-bay north and south gable ends have an interior corbelled brick stove chimney at the gable ridge.

Centered on the west (rear) facade of the main block is a one-by-one-bay two-story frame kitchen wing, given the house a "T" shaped plan. The wing has the same roofline, siding and foundation as the main block and appears to be contemporary with it. There is a concrete block interior chimney at its west gable ridge. A gable roof one-story, one-bay enclosed entrance portico projects from the northwest corner of the wing. This contains the entrance to the small basement beneath the wing. On the north facade of the wing is a three-by-one bay, one story shed roof addition with new 1/1 windows and an entrance into the kitchen.

The interior of the Cox House has center-hall-two-parlor plan. The kitchen opens at the rear end of the hall. The door and window surrounds throughout the interior are a wide wood molding with bull's-eye corner blocks. There are crown molded base boards. The kitchen has narrow vertical boards as wainscot, surmounted by a modern chair rail. The enclosed stair has a plain rectangular balustrade and newel post. The stair has ceiling pendants at the corners of the stair well. The floor and ceilings are of modern material.
