Kingston Hall

c. 1780-1783

Through extensive architectural and historical research, the factual development of Kingston Hall is much clearer than expected for an eighteenth-century house. During the past half-century historians have tried to determine an exact date for the construction of Kingston Hall, and estimations have ranged through the first half of the eighteenth century. However, additional new information indicates that Kingston Hall was built during the last two decades of the eighteenth century by Thomas King.

Similar to other "telescope" dwellings, this three-part brick house was accomplished in stages. Construction was begun during the late years of the American Revolution, for Thomas King was assessed in 1783 for, "A new dwelling house with two rooms, a hall and entry below, part of wood-work unfinished." Fifteen years later Thomas King's plantation was described a second time by the federal assessors,

1 Dwelling House built of brick 40 by 34 feet, two story high, 7 windows 5½ feet by 3½ feet, 10 windows 4 feet 8 inches by 2½ feet, 1 Kitchen built of brick 24 feet square, two story high, 1 Dairy or Milk house 14 feet square, 1 Smoke house 11 feet 9 inches square, 1 Stable 35 feet by 26 feet, 1 Carriage house 20 feet by 16 feet, 1 very old Hen house 20 feet by 15 feet.

This second, more complete description locates the surrounding outbuildings, most notably the two-story brick kitchen, built at the same time as the house or between the span of the two assessments. Lastly, the single-story colonnade, not mentioned in the assessment, was evidently erected after 1798 to connect the main house with the domestic services.

Kingston Hall is architecturally significant for several other reasons. In addition to being a key example of the colonnaded type plantation house, Kingston Hall displays the earliest known local use of a Palladian-style projecting pavilion capped by a decorated pediment. Inside, the most important original woodwork is located in the entry and the old "hall." A turned baluster stair rises in the "entry", and the "hall" is fitted with floor to ceiling raised paneling. The "hall" is the only fully paneled room to survive in Somerset County. Equally noteworthy features include the remnants of a wood pin roof over the front pavilion and early finishes in the old kitchen. The conical roofed brick ice house is a rare outbuilding and one of a small collection of circular farm structures in Maryland.

Kingston Hall stands on a tract of land known as "Conclusion." which was comprised of three separate tracts called "Straights," "Johnson's" and "Everden's Lot." These three tracts were consolidated under a resurvey initiated by Robert King II in 1728/9. Totalling 1,500 acres, the "Conclusion" lands were specifically mentioned in Robert King's will of 1755,

I give and devise unto my grandson Thomas King and to his heirs and assigns for ever, all my lands situate lying and being on the south side of Great Annemessex River and head thereof where his deceased father first settled.

Thomas King occupied the "Conclusion" tract through the remainder of the eighteenth century, and after his death the property passed to his only child, Elizabeth Barnes King, who married Colonel Henry James Carroll. James and Elizabeth Carroll lived in the house through the early nineteenth century, and after Henry's death in 1818, their son, Thomas King Carroll, acquired control of the plantation. Thomas King Carroll held several prominent county and state offices including a one-year term as Governor of Maryland (1830-1831). Carroll began his political career as a delegate (1816-1817), and then became a judge of the Levy Court (1825-1826). Between 1826 and 1829 Carroll resided over the Orphans Court. During the Carrolls ownership of Kingston Hall, their daughter, Anna Ella Carroll (1815-1894) was born.

The Annemessex River plantation did not remain in the Carroll family much longer, for a suit was filed in Somerset Court against Thomas King Carroll in an effort to retrieve accumulated debts. A court appointed sheriff, Samuel G. Holbrook, sold Kingston Hall to John Upshur Dennis in September of 1837 (GH 9/210). With the death of John U. Dennis in 1851, the estate passed to his son, George Robertson Dennis (1822-1882), a prominent politician who served in the State House of Delegates, the State Senate, and finally the United States Senate.

Following the death of George R. Dennis, Kingston Hall was transferred in a court settlement to Alice J. Wood (OTB 34/371). Subsequent owners have included Harry T. and Vera B. Phoebus (BLB 116/31), Charlton and Virginia Gunter (BLB 162/173) and several others. The current owners purchased Kingston Hall in 1975.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Kingston Hall, a Georgian style dwelling, is located one-half mile from Kingston on the west side of Maryland Route 667. It is two stories plus an attic, three bays wide by two deep and is connected by a one-story brick hyphen to a two-story plus loft brick kitchen wing. The central bay on the south side of the main block forms a projecting pavilion surmounted by a triangular pediment centered in which is a small oval window. The central doorway is framed by fluted pilasters and a triangular pediment supported by carved brackets at the corners in a nineteenth century style. The door has six octagonal panels. The cornice on the pediment has a row of block modillions above a Greek fret. The cornice trim along the roof and roof pediment is identical. The Flemish bond brickwork is painted white. Above each window, six over six lights, is a white wood trapezoidal panel scored to simulate above. Between the first and second stories is a three row brick belt course, also in Flemish bond. The house has a brick watertable.

Recent owners have removed nineteenth century additions to Kingston Hall that existed at least through the 1930's as illustrated by Henry Chandler Forman in Early Manor Plantation Houses of Maryland (Easton, Maryland: the author, 1934, p. 152). The southern elevation had a two-story porch extending across the facade and dormers on the roof. A tall, square cupola existed in the center of the ridge of the roof. The cupola had pilasters at the corner of each facade framing a window which extended to the cornice. The four-sided roof curved to a finial at the center of the cupola. The north facade had a pedimented porch at the central doors supported by paired, square piers.

On one east end there is evidence in the coloration of the brickwork that an addition has been removed at some time. In addition to the belt between the first two stories there is another three course belt above the second story on the gable ends. There are two small windows in the gable.

On the north side is a small hooded porch over the center door (twentieth century addition). The first story windows have twelve over twelve lights and the second story, six over six. Above each window in this side is a brick segmental arch. There are inside end chimneys on both the east and west gables.

Under the main block is a full cellar in Flemish bond brick with four rooms. The attic has two small rooms and a tiny chamber in the pediment.

The old kitchen wing is two bays wide and one room deep. The walls are brick laid in common bond, four rows of stretcher to one of headers or Flemish bond. There is a two-row belt course between the first and second stories and a simple box cornice along the gable roof. There is an exterior chimney on the west end and two small two-over two light windows in the gable.

Kingston Hall is an interesting eighteenth century house with simple but sophisticated exterior and interior Georgian period detailing. The structure presents an interesting combination of traditional construction with Georgian detailing.

Kingston Hall has a four-room plan. The stair hall, in the southeast corner, has a panelled wainscot and panelled stair soffit. The graceful stairway has thin block-and-turned balusters, three per tread, and scrolled stepends.

The northeast parlor is fully panelled. The fireplace is framed by colonettes beneath panelled end blocks. Flanking the fireplace are reeded pilasters.

The dining room and library are very similar. Both rooms have plain wainscoting and molded cornices. Both corner fireplaces are very plain.

The old kitchen, in the wing, has a large fireplace with a brick segmental arch. The three exterior walls are exposed brick. On the second floor a single-board partition separates the stair hall from the bedroom. In this bedroom is a small fireplace with a rather crudely formed arch. The center voussoir is a brickbat. The small chamber south of the stairhall has an opening in the ceiling leading to the left. The door from this chamber into the stair hall has a crude iron hook instead of a latch.

An interesting feature on the property of Kingston Hall is the brick, circular ice house. Laid in common bond with five rows of stretchers to one of headers, this ice house has a high conical roof with a wood finial at its peak.

8. SIGNIFICANCE, continued

By the turn of the nineteenth century Thomas King had died; his daughter and son-in-law Henry James Carroll had moved to Kingston Hall, the birthplace of their son Thomas King Carroll (1793-1873). The younger Carroll attended school and read law during his parents occupancy of the house. In 1818 after the death of Henry James Carroll, he assumed control of the plantation. While in residence at Kingston Hall, his daughter Anna Ella Carroll (1815-1894) was born. During the Civil War Miss Carroll became a national figure as a proponent of the union and an unofficial advisor to Abraham

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Kingston Hall is an interesting, small late eighteenth century house which presents an interesting combination of styles. The room arrangement with its corner fireplaces and corner hall reflects the traditional plan common to the early decades of the century. Its exterior detail particularly the cornice window treatment, and the projecting pedimented pavilion with the circular gable window is usually associated with the mid-Georgian style. The mantles in the northwest and southwest rooms and the woodwork in the stair hall (southeast room) represents transitional style from late Georgian into Federal.

Perhaps the most important architectural element is the icehouse--one of the few known circular dependencies in Maryland. Its preservation is important to the study of domestic dependencies as a part of our material culture. The two-story eighteenth century kitchen is a second important dependency at Kingston Hall.

Kingston Hall's historic associations begin in the mid-eighteenth century when Robert King (d. 1755) owned the property. The King family were large land owners owing to the property amassed by Robert King before he moved to Accomack County, Virginia. His son, Nehemiah King built Beverley of Somerset (National Register) a 1790's structure with a two-story central octagonal bay.

Thomas King, a grandson, obtained the tract Conclusion as his inheritance and erected Kingston Hall. The property located on an 860-acre plantation included "1 Dwelling house built on Brick 40 feet by 2 stories high" and a "kitchen built of brick 24 feet square 2 story high," a dairy house, smoke house, stable, carriage house, and "a very old hen house," a granary, 3 corn houses, a stable, a "Negro house," a blacksmith shop, two barns, and three log houses occupied by John Williams, William Carver and Levi Beauchamp. (Source: the 1798 Federal Direct Tax Assessment, Somerset County, Maryland.)

The listings for a granary (34' x 25') and a corn house (20' x 8') indicate that King grew grain and not tobacco the crop most commonly associated with eighteenth century tidewater culture.

Lincoln. Her plans for a land seige of Vicksburg, although initially viewed skeptically, proved correct when the town surrendered in 1863.

Her father's brief (1830-1831) tenure in the Maryland State House escaped national attention. Carroll began his political career as a delegate (1816-1817) and then became a judge first of the Levy court (1825-1826) and later of the Orphans Court (1826-1829). During his year as governor, Carroll encouraged the improvement of the University of Maryland, urged Congress to provide benefits for the veterans of the Revolution, and advocated penal reform. The Maryland historian James H. Fitzgerald described Carroll as a politician who dispensed patronage freely and "patronized the spoils concept of government."¹

In the 1820's the Circuit Court of Somerset County had decreed that Carroll, then a judge of the Orphans Court, owed considerable debts to William Williams. Although the suit is especially mentioned in the Somerset County Land Records, the Circuit Court records yielded no information on the case.

In 1835 the Sheriff of Somerset County was empowered to sell Carroll's property to pay his debts. The deed to John Upshur Dennis includes the statement "the said Thomas [Carroll] is a convict of record." However, Carroll's shady reputation proved no hinderance to future political appointments first as a Maryland lottery commissioner and, in 1849, as Naval Officer of Baltimore.

The new owner John Upshur Dennis (d. 1851) introduced another political family to Kingston Hall. Three members of the family served in the House of Representatives, John Upshur Dennis' son, George Robertson Dennis (1822-1882), served in the United States Senate. Senator Dennis inherited Kingston Hall in 1851 where he had previously been living after setting up medical practice in a nearby village. His political career began at the state level in the House of Delegates and the Senate. He represented Maryland at the 1856 Whig convention and the 1868 Democratic convention. In 1873 Dennis entered the Senate. His participation in national affairs occurred during the disputed Tilden-Hayes election (1876-1877). Dennis, although a Democrat, supported Hayes in direct contradiction with the Blair Resolutions from the state legislature which supported Tilden.

Dennis served only one term in the Senate. In 1879 he ran for Governor. The election was the central focus of a fude between two political bosses Arthur Pue Gorman and William Pinckney Whyte. Dennis' support came from the weaker of the two; therefore, his political career was terminated and he retired to Kingston Hall.

Dennis was the last political figure to live at Kingston Hall. During the twentieth century the house has had a dozen owners.
