Coventry Parish Church Ruins
Rehobeth
public

The Coventry Parish Church Ruins are architecturally significant for several reasons, in addition to being an important reminder of the pivotal role the Episcopal Church acquired as the official state religion during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

The picturesque two-story Flemish bond walls survive with ten brick jack arches and constitute an impressive brick edifice. The three primary walls easily evoke the awe and inspiration often associated with abandoned structures. Measuring seventy-six feet across by fifty feet deep, this house of worship was the largest of its denomination on the Eastern Shore of Maryland. Its size and prominence are directly tied to the concentration of wealthy plantation owners in Somerset County during the second half of the eighteenth century. In fact, similar construction techniques are found repeated in several key plantation houses in the immediate vicinity.

Just as the building reflects the eighteenth-century prominence of the Anglican Church, it also represents the eventual decline and loss of support for the Church, especially for a rural congregation such as Coventry. By the late nineteenth century, competition from Presbyterians, Methodists, Baptists, and other denominations along with a static rural population severely curtailed vital growth for Coventry Parish. As a result, the ambitious eighteenth-century brick church was abandoned for more modern structures in Pocomoke City, Crisfield, and nearby Marion.

In June of 1692, by an act of first assembly under Governor Lionel Copley, the Church of England became Maryland's official church. Parishes were laid out in several counties of the province. Vestries were elected, and ministers were commissioned. In addition, for the support and use of the Church, a tax of forty pounds of tobacco was levied on every tithable person regardless of religious beliefs.

Somerset County, then comprising the entire lower Eastern Shore of Maryland, was divided into four parishes: Somerset, Coventry, Stepney, and Snow Hill. These early parish churches were first located on navigable waterways with convenient access for their parishioners. Coventry Parish church was situated in the early town of Rehoboth (now spelled Rehobeth) on the Pocomoke River. The site of the initial building is located directly behind the ruinous walls of its replacement. From all indications, the first church was a single-story brick structure measuring 28'2" by 59', erected in the late seventeenth or early eighteenth century. The parcel of ground on which the church was built was not conveyed officially until 1735 when Robert Jenkins Henry sold the land to Reverend James Robertson, John Dennis, Jr., Thomas Dixon, Thomas Hayward, Thomas Williams, William Lane, and Isaac Williams, vestrymen in and for the Parish of Coventry.

The first church was a brick structure which is mentioned in the vestry minutes of January 7, 1793,

Ordered by the vestry that Thomas Bruff and Littleton Dennis call on those who have had bricks from the Old Church to pay 15p. per hundred for them and to agree with Littleton Long to plant trees in the church yard under their direction and to put blocks at the church doors.

Ten years prior to this decision to dismantle the old church, it was ordered and approved by the vestry to build a new church at Rehoboth. Eighteen months later on Easter Monday, March 28, 1785, Isaac and Stephen Marshall were bound and obligated to build,

A Brick House seventy-two feet long and forty-six feet wide from inside to inside, with a wall of twenty feet in height--beside a sufficient foundation in the ground with a wall as high as the Water Table of twenty-seven inches thick with a rest of three inches in the inside for sleepers.

Motions for the completing additional work on the new church were entered from 1785 until ~~the year 1788~~ ^{LATE 1792.} ~~Recently, the church was completed shortly after~~
~~was not~~ consecrated until July 17, 1803 by Bishop Clagett.

THE COVENTRY PARISH CHURCH WAS

The Rehoboth Church remained in use until the late nineteenth century when the Episcopal congregations dwindled in size and no longer required the large rural brick church. It was decided to abandon the structure and join congregations with the Chapel of Ease of St. Paul's near Marion, presently the governing body of Coventry Parish. As a result of stabilization efforts initiated by Cassius M. Dashiell of Princess Anne, dedication services were held on September 23, 1928, to commemorate the ruinous edifice.

DESCRIPTION SUMMARY

Coventry Parish Ruins

The Coventry Parish Ruins are the remnants of a two-story seven-bay by three-bay Flemish bond brick church erected between 1785 and 1788 near the Pocomoke River in the small village of Rehobeth, which is located in southern Somerset County, Maryland. The reddish-brown walls are accented by ten gauged brick jack arches which survive in place on the first floor. In addition, the structure survives with a three-row belt course and portions of the window and door frames. The site of the earlier parish church is located directly behind the ruin and is marked by four concrete piers. A cemetery extends around the east and south sides of the churchyard.

GENERAL DESCRIPTION

The Coventry Parish Ruins are located in the small village of Rehobeth, Maryland, which is situated on the west bank of the Pocomoke River. Maryland Route 667 passes due north of Rehobeth and connects US 13 and MD 413 at Marion. The two-story brick ruin faces north and is accompanied by a few aging sycamore trees, a cemetery and the site of the earlier Episcopal church.

The remains of this ca. 1785 seven-bay by three-bay Flemish bond structure measures 76 feet across by 50 feet deep. The ruin has been reduced to three primary walls since the south wall rises only a foot above ground level, except for one single story pier. Transomed entrances were located in the outer bays of the three-bay west elevation, and in the central bay of the north facade; the remaining bays held windows.

Despite its ruinous state for nearly a century, most of the first floor walls and some of the second floor walls remain, and exemplify the best traditions of 18th-century brick masonry. A stepped water table defines the base of the large rectangle, and a three-row belt course stretches between the first and second floors. Perhaps the most dramatic features of this ruin, aside from its sheer size, are the ten intact brick arches of the north and west walls. Each window or door opening has an orange-colored jack arch of gauged brick laid with a very fine mortar joint. These ten arches contrast with the reddish-brown Flemish bond walls. Each opening also has the remnants of the 18th-century window or door frames. The center window frame on the west wall is complete. Parts of wrought iron H-hinges and one keeper for the front door-bar survive on various door frames. In 1928, Cassius M. Dashiell from nearby Princess Anne funded the first stabilization efforts, which included laying a concrete floor and capping the brick walls. Iron tie rods were also implanted in the walls to help the stabilization. Against the east interior wall a brick altar was erected with a concrete cross. Along with stabilizing the 1785-1788 structure, the corners of the earlier parish church were located and identified by four concrete piers.

The cemetery with above-ground markers is located to the east. One group of markers is surrounded by an elaborate cast iron fence.

SIGNIFICANCE SUMMARY:

Coventry Parish Ruins

The Coventry Parish Ruins are significant for their architecture, and for their association with the history of the Episcopal Church on Maryland's rural Lower Eastern Shore in the period immediately following the Revolution. At the time of its construction (1785-88), this church was the largest of its denomination on Maryland's Eastern Shore; not only its great size (76' x 50'), but also its sophisticated detailing, reflect the prominence of the Episcopal Church among the wealthy planters of Somerset County. It is especially noteworthy that this substantial house of worship was constructed in the midst of perhaps the bleakest period in the history of the Episcopal Church in Maryland: following the Revolution, many Episcopalians left the Church because of its association with England; membership declined sharply, and many Eastern Shore parish churches were abandoned. The size and refinement of the Coventry Parish church suggest an unmatched vitality and loyalty within its original congregation. Despite its ruinous condition, the structure retains sufficient integrity to evoke this association: the three standing walls clearly convey its massing, and the refinement of its Flemish bond brickwork - including such features as a stepped water table, belt course, and ten surviving jack arches of orange gauged brick - remains clearly evident.

HISTORY AND SUPPORT

In June of 1692, by an act of the first assembly under Governor Lionel Copley, the Church of England became Maryland's official church.¹ As a result, parishes were laid out in several counties of the province, vestries were elected and ministers were commissioned. In addition, for the support and use of The Church, a tax of forty pounds of tobacco was levied on every tithable person regardless of religious denomination.²

Coventry Parish church was situated in the early town of Rehoboth (now spelled Rehobeth) on the Pocomoke River. The site of the initial building is located directly behind the ruinous walls of its replacement. From all indications, the first church was a single story brick structure measuring 28'2" by 59', erected in the late 17th or early 18th century.³ The parcel of ground on which the church was built was not conveyed officially until 1735 when Robert Jenkins Henry sold to Reverend James Robertson, John Dennis, Jr., Thomas Dixon, Thomas Hayward, Thomas Williams, William Lane, and Isaac Williams, vestrymen in and for the Parish of Coventry,

...a certain part of parcell of land in Rehoboth Town in the Parish, County and Province aforesaid on which the Parish Church now standeth and next adjoining...containing and now laid out for two acres more or less...⁴

The fact that the first church was brick instead of frame is suggested by the entry in the vestry minutes of January 7, 1683,

Ordered by the vestry that Thomas Bruff and Littleton Dennis call on those who have had bricks from the Old Church to pay 15 p. per hundred for them and to agree with Littleton Long to plant trees in the church yard under their direction and to put blocks at the church doors...⁵

Then years prior to this decision to dismantle the old church, it was ordered and approved by the vestry to build a new church at Rehoboth. On Easter Monday, March 28, 1785, Isaac and Stephen Marshall were bound and obligated to build

A Brick House seventy-two feet long and forty-six feet wide from inside to inside, with a wall of Twenty feet in height--beside a sufficient foundation in the ground with a wall as high as the Water Table of twenty-seven inches thick with a rest of three inches in the inside for the sleepers...⁶

Motions for completing additional work on the new church were entered from 1785 until mid-year 1788. Evidently, the church was completed shortly afterwards but not consecrated until July 17, 1803 by Bishop Clagett.⁷

The period immediately following the Revolution was an extremely difficult time in the history of the Episcopal Church in Maryland. The Church's English associations rendered it unpopular, and membership declined precipitously. Many church buildings, lacking regular use or maintenance, began to deteriorate; a survey of Eastern Shore parishes carried out in 1820 by Reverend Purnell H. Smith at the request of the Bishop of the Diocese found many churches in ruinous condition. Despite the urgings of Bishop Kemp, the reorganization of congregations and reconstruction of church buildings did not become general on the Eastern Shore until the early 1840s. In light of the general decline of the Church following the Revolution, it is interesting that the parishioners of Coventry would undertake the construction in 1785 of such a substantial and refined house of worship.

The Rehoboth Church remained in use until the late 19th century when the Episcopal congregations again dwindled in size and Coventry Parish no longer required the large rural brick church. It was decided to abandon the structure and join congregations with the Chapel of Ease of St. Paul's at Marion, presently the governing body of Coventry Parish. As a result of stabilization efforts initiated by Cassius M. Dashiell of Princess Anne, dedication services were held on September 23, 1928 to commemorate the ruinous edifice.

This church is now in ruins with sections of three of its walls remaining. Although the slope of the roof cannot be ascertained, much other information about the structure can be gathered from the ruins. It was seven bays wide with a central door and three bays deep. The central door had an overlight. The windows were capped with flat lintels of polished stretchers. A three string belt course runs around the building between the first and second storey. The water table is a simple step one of two rows of protruding square bricks. All of the glazing on the bricks is of a soft green color. The further deterioration of this ruin has been prevented by capping the walls with cement. As a ruin this still is an attractive structure and reveals much about its construction. As a complete building it must have been a superb early Georgian church.
