(possibly a modified earlier structure)

Description:

This two story, four bay hip-roofed house appears to be an American Foursquare but could be an early 20th century modification of a late 19th century building. It is a brick structure with a four bay facade with two central front doors. At the second story there are just two windows, with no openings above the two central entrances. The windows have segmentally arched heads with single pane sash windows. The doors have similar segmental arches above single pane transoms. An early 20th century hip roofed porch extends across the front.

According to the 1877 Atlas, there was a building on this property at that time. It belonged to J. Fiery. That earlier structure was either removed or greatly modified into the present building.
