Description

This brick building, located on Keedysville's "square" is a two story, five bay combined commercial and residential structure. Bricks are laid in flemish bond at the three south bays. The two north bays, an addition, are laid in common bond. Windows have six over six sash beneath wide wooden lintels, a feature typical of brick houses of the mid 19th century in the region. A bracketed cornice of Italianate design extends across the front. Entrances are located in the south and second from the north bays. Each has a three-light transom above the door. The central bays at the front story contain a large display window divided into three parts and topped with a wide lintel like the other windows. This commercial window appears to be contemporary with the addition, cornice and other modifications.

A hip-roofed porch, a later addition, supported by turned posts with brackets extends across the front. The roof is of standing seam sheet metal and chimneys are located inside the end walls.

This building was the home and shop of David Bell who made and sold boots and shoes in the last quarter of the 19th century. Later it was a jewelry store. According to Moats' history of Keedysville, Thomas Scharf's history of Washington County says this building is the oldest brick structure in Keedysville, having been built in 1833, by Andrew Sigler. Modifications seem to date from the 1860s or '70s.
