Description

This 19th century two arched stone bridge is one of about 22 which still remain in Washington County. With only two arches, this is one of the smaller ones, spanning the Little Antietam where it widened as the result of the mill dam. Although the bridge is unmarked, it has been attributed to John Weaver who is credited with building other stone structures in town and a few of the county's other bridges.

Collectively, Washington County's stone bridges form one of the best and most intact collections of these structures in the East.
