This property includes two contributing buildings: an asbestos shingle sided log house with a recessed double porch, and a stone and brick summer kitchen with two chimneys. The original configuration of the house is difficult to ascertain from the outside because the porches have been fully enclosed, masking the original facade arrangement. The house is of log construction as is evident from the depth of the window jambs. The supposed facade arrangement is window, door, door, window, which would not be uncommon in a German influenced community. Windows in the main house have two over two light sash, probably replacing six over six sash. The summer kitchen windows are original with six over six sash beneath wide wooden lintels, a window type associated with the mid 19th century. One window is protected by a pair of paneled shutters. According the 1877 Atlas, this house belonged to David Barkman, and was part of the mill complex. The mill was located across the street from this house.
