Benjamin Aydelotte House
(J.R. Boston Farm)
Sheephouse Road (original site)
Pocomoke City vicinity

Estimated to be one of the oldest structures in southern Worcester County, this story-and-a-half, brick-ended frame house was evidently erected shortly after the revolution on land called "Black Ridge," then owned by Benjamin and Esther Aydelotte. Flemish bond brick gable ends rise on each end and the front and back walls are of frame covered with weatherboards. Exposed inside is a series of heavy tie beams decorated with corner beads. One beam is dated with a chalk inscription, "August 18th 1786." While the date could have been written to indicate another event, the type of construction and the surviving elements of original woodwork agree architecturally with the scrawled date.

Built with a hall/parlor plan, the 18th century structure retains portions of the original raised-panel woodwork and board partitions. The house was altered extensively during the 19th and 20th centuries; doors and windows were repositioned, and a cross gable and shed addition were added.

During the past 15 years the house was moved from its original site of Sheephouse Road to a new location nearer the Maryland/Virginia line. The farm on which the house was originally erected, known as "Black Ridge," was acquired in the mid 18th century by Esther Aydelotte from her father, Peter Watson of adjacent Accomack County, Virginia. Benjamin Aydelotte purchased other tracts as well, mostly on the west side of the head of Swanscut Creek. Before his death in December 1793, Benjamin and Esther Aydelotte deeded ownership of "Black Ridge," then containing 240 acres, to their son William, who farmed the land until his death in 1809. In his will, William directed: "I give and bequeath unto my beloved wife Mary Aydelott all my other lands lying to the North of the aforementioned ditch and line of marked trees. During her natural life and then to my son John Aydelott to him and his assigns forever." John Aydelotte retained ownership of the Black Ridge lands until 1825, when he sold 185 acres with the house to his brother William. Thirteen years later, in June 1838, William sold the Black Ridge plantation, along with parcels known as "Hog Hill" and "Miflin's Discovery," to his nephew, John's son William J. Aydelotte, who maintained ownership until the late 19th century. During the early 20th century the farm passed into the Powell and related Boston families.

The J. R. Boston Farm house is a one-and-a-half story building with brick gables and frame side walls. The brick is laid in Flemish bond with random glazing. One wall is painted red and the other white, as are the other parts of the structure. There are two small windows in each gable with one over one sash, having wide frames and arches of vertical headers. The east wall has a huge fireplace on the outside of the gable which is built like a pyramid to the top of the small windows, then it becomes free standing. This latter feature is partially concealed by a later overhang to the eaves. On the facade a peaked gable has been added.
