Aydelotte House is a one-story and loft, frame structure that was built around the first quarter of the nineteenth century. It now stands on concrete piles and appears to have been moved onto the site. It is two bays long and retains some beaded clapboard and curved end-boards of the cornice. The upper sash in the northeast gable is semicircular.

Within, the enclosed stair is located in the east corner and is covered with beaded boards. There is a two-piece chair rail which is painted to look like wood grain. There is some trim around the windows and batten doors. There is no fireplace but its place can be traced in the woodwork.
